FIRST SESSION, FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

fully repel those charges which always follow where the temptation soon demonstrate that no more corrupt or corrupting device, no wilder or more visionary project, ever entered the brain of the schemer or the empiric.

If the people of the United States were fully awake and aroused to If the people of the United States were fully awake and aroused to their interests, and could see things as they are, instead of increasing the power of Congress over the currency they would by the shortest practicable process divorce the two, completely and forever. And this can only be done finally, effectually, irreversibly, by the resumption of specie payment. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is hardly an exaggeration to say that, ever since the Government was compelled to resort to irredeemable currency during the war, the assembling of Congress and its continuance in session have been the most disturbing elements in the business of the country. It is literally true that no man can tell what a day may bring forth. One large interest looks hopefully to contraction and the lowering of the gold premium; another is ruined unless there is such a movement toward expansion as will send gold up. Each side, of course, endeavors to influence and convince Congress. Both sides naturally have their sympathizing advocates on this floor, and hence the substantial business interests of the country are kept in a feverish, doubtful, speculative state. Men's minds are turned from honest industry to schemes of financial gambling, the public morals suffer, old-fashioned integrity is forgotten, and solid, enduring prospective with heact gainst and solid, enduring prospective with heact gainst and solid, enduring prospective. suffer, old-rasmoned integrity is forgotten, and solid, enduring prosperity, with honest gains and quiet contentment, is rendered impossible. We have suffered thus far in perhaps as light a degree as could be expected under the circumstances; but once adopt the insane idea that all currency shall be issued directly by the Government, and that Congress shall be the judge of the amount demanded by the "wants of trade," and you have this country adrift, rudderless, on a sea of troubles, shoreless and soundless.

It is a singular circumstance, Mr. Chairman-one of those odd happenings sometimes brought about by political mutations—that those who urge this scheme upon the Government are democrats, every one of whom would doubtless claim to be a true disciple of Andrew Jackson. And yet all the evils of which Jackson warned the country in his famous controversy with the United States Bank are a thousand fold magnified and a thousand-fold aggravated in this plan of making the Treasury Department itself the bank, with Congress for the govthe Treasury Department itself the bank, with Congress for the governing board of directors. I commend to gentlemen of democratic antecedents a careful perusal of Jackson's great message of July 10, 1832, and I wish them to frankly tell this House how they think Jackson would have regarded the establishment of a great national papermoney machine, to be located for all time in the Treasury Department, the bills of which shall have no provision for their redemption, and the amount of those bills to be determined by a majority vote in

And then, after Jackson's veto message shall have been diligently perused and inwardly digested by the democratic advocates of irredeemable paper money, I will ask them if the present national-bank system does not fully meet all of Jackson's objections, and if it is not, indeed, as nearly as the difference of time and circumstances will perindeed, as nearly as the difference of time and circumstances will permit, such a system of banking as Jackson indirectly commended and as he professed himself ready to submit a plan for if Congress should desire it? Disclaiming, as I have done, any special championship of the national banks, but merely referring to facts of record, I would be glad further to ask if the present system, in its entire freedom from monopoly, being equally open to all; if in the absolute protection it affords to that innocent third party, the billholder, (no man ever having lost a dollar by the bills of national banks during the thirteen years the system has been in operation, whereas in the preceding thirteen the system has been in operation, whereas in the preceding thirteen years the losses to the people by bills of State banks exceeded fifty millions of dollars;) if in that universal credit attached to its bills, saving the people all losses from exchange or discount wherever payment is to be made within the United States; if in its protection of ment is to be made within the United States; if in its protection of the rights of depositors; if in its strength and solvency in time of financial disaster; if in its subjection to taxation, both by the General and State Governments, until it confessedly pays a heavier tax than any other species of property; if in its capacity to measure by the unvarying law of supply and demand the precise amount of circulation required by the "wants of trade,"—I would be glad, I repeat, to ask any democratic opponent of the system if it does not in each and all these features fill the ideal requirement of a bank as foreshadowed by Jackson, and if it does not indeed far transcend any ideal Jackson had, in its freedom for all to engage in it, in its absolute security to the public, and in its singular adaptation to act as a regulator of the currency, preventing undue expansion and undue contraction with equal and unfailing certainty, and adjusting itself at once to the specie standard whenever the Government shall place its own notes at par with coin?

once to the specie standard whenever the Government shall place its own notes at par with coin?

It is urged by the opponents of the banking system that the three hundred and twenty millions of bank circulation can be supplied by legal-tenders and the interest on that amount of bonds stopped! How? Does any gentleman suppose that the bonds owned by the banks, and on deposit in the Treasury, will be exchanged for legal-tenders of a new and inflated issue? Those bonds are payable, principal and interest, in gold; and, with the present amount of legal-tender notes, they are worth in the market from $1.16 to $1.25. What will they be worth in paper money when you double the amount of legal-tenders and postpone the day of specie resumption far beyond the vision of prophet or seer? And this enormous issue of legal-tenders to take the place of bank-notes is only the beginning of the policy to be inaugurated. The "wants of trade" would speedily demand another issue, for the essential nature of an irredeemable currency is that it has no limit till a reaction is born of crushing disaster. A lesson might be learned (by those willing to be taught by fact and experience) from the course of events during the war. When we had one hundred and fifty millions of legal-tender in circulation, it stood for a long while nearly at par with gold. As the issue increased in amount the depreciation was very rapid, and at the time we fixed the four hundred million limit, that whole vast sum had less purchasing power in exchange for lands, or houses, or merchandise than the hundred and fifty millions had two years before. In the spring of 1862, $150,000,000 of legal-tender would buy in the market $147,000,000 in gold coin. In June, 1864, $400,000,000 of legal-tender would buy only $140,000,000 in gold coin.

And if we had not fixed the four-hundred-million limit, but had gone on issuing additional amounts according to the "wants of trade," as now argued and urged by the modern democratic financiers, the result would have been that at each successive inflation the purchasing power of the aggregate mass would have been made less, and the value of the whole would have gone down, down, till it reached that point of utter worthlessness which so many like experiments have reached before; and the legal-tender, with all its vast capacity for good in a great national crisis, would have taken its place in history alongside of the French assignat and the Continental currency. The alongside of the French assignat and the Continental currency. The four-hundred-million limit happily saved us that direful experience, and at once caused the legal-tender to appreciate; but, unwilling to learn by this striking fact, the inflationists insist upon a scheme of expansion which would speedily raise the price of bonds to unprecedented figures, and by the time they should succeed in purchasing those that now stand as security for national-bank circulation they would have increased the national debt by countless millions, and instead of making a saving for the Treasury they would end by depriving it of the eight millions of tax annually paid by the banks, and the people would have lost the additional eight millions of local tax derived from the same source.

I have not spoken of the confusion, the distress, the ruin that would result from forcing twenty-one hundred banks suddenly to wind up their affairs with nearly a thousand millions of dollars due them, which their affairs with nearly a thousand millions of dollars due them, which in some form must needs be liquidated and paid. The commercial fabric of the country rests upon the bank credits, and nothing short of financial lunacy could demand their rude disturbance. Whoever would strike down the banks, under the delusion that they can be driven to surrender their bonds for inflated legal-tenders, knows little of the laws of finance and still less of the laws of human action. Among the anomalies presented in the currency discussion, Mr. Chairman, is that the West and the South should have so large an element clamorous for inflation. Of all sections interested in the specie standard the West and the South stand first. The great staples produced in those vast and fertile regions, wheat, corn, flour, beef, pork, hides, tobacco, hemp, cotton, rice, and sugar, are inevitably and peremptorily subjected to the gold standard when sold. The price of cotton sent to Lowell is just as much determined by the gold standard as that which is exported to Manchester, and the breadstuffs sold in New York are daily equated with the prices of the Liverpool corn in New York are daily equated with the prices of the Liverpool corn exchange. And so of all the other commodities. And yet we hear representatives of the great interests that are thus compelled to sell at gold prices, resolute and determined in their demands that they shall be allowed to purchase all their supplies on the paper basis. When it is remembered that the whole of the annual crop in this country, reckoning all products, reaches the enormous amount of three thousand millions on the gold basis, and that the surplus not consumed by the producers is many hundreds of millions of dollars, and that the value of the whole is estimated by the gold standard, the farmers of the country may find profitable food for reflection in calculating what the agricultural interest loses every year by an irre-

One great and leading interest of my own and other States has suffered, still suffers, and will continue to suffer so long as the currency is of irredeemable paper. I mean the ship-building and navigation interest—one that does more for the country and asks less from it than any other except the agricultural; an interest that represents our distinctive nationality in all climes and upon all seas; an interest more essentially and intensely American than any other that falls under the legislative power of the Government, and which asks only to-day to be left where the founders of the Republic placed it a bundred years ago. Give us the same basis of currency that our bundred years ago. Give us the same basis of currency that our great competitors of the British Empire enjoy, and we will, within the lifetime of those now living, float a larger tonnage under the American flag than was ever enrolled by one nationality since the science of navigation has been known among men. Aye, more, sir; give us the specie basis, and the merchant marine of America, sailing into all zones and gathering gain from all continents, will bring back into all zones and gathering gain from all continents, will bring back to our shores its golden profits and supply to us that coin which will steady our system and offset the drains that weaken us in other directions. But ships built on the paper basis cannot compete with the lower-priced ones of the gold basis, and whoever advocates a perpetuity of paper money in this country confesses his readiness and willingness to sacrifice the navigation and commercial interest for all time

It is often made the subject of reproach by the opponents of the republican party that ten years have elapsed since the war closed and nothing effective has been done toward the resumption of specie payment. Even if this were true the democrats are not justified in making the charge, for their party organization has been the principal obstacle and stumbling-block in the way of resumption. But, cipal obstacle and stumbling-block in the way of resumption. But, in fact, a great deal has been done toward specie payment by preventing inflation and keeping the Government thus far within the four-hundred-million limit. To do this it has been necessary to wage a very sharp war with the democrats, and against their demands that the national debt be paid in legal-tender notes, the republicans have had their hands full thus far to maintain the demands and dues of common heavests. common honesty

As matter of fact, however, I am quite willing to admit that during these ten years no positive and vigorous steps have been taken ing these ten years no positive and vigorous steps have been taken toward specie payment. So long as the business of the country was progressing reasonably well, it was not practicable or possible to set to work deliberately, without the pressure of necessity, to force specie resumption. Every man of affairs knows instinctively, without argument, that this was so, and he knows why it was so. Though not having the same moral issue involved, we were situated very much as Mr. Pitt found himself when asked why he did not bring in a bill for the suppression of the slave-trade. He said, "The Bristol merchants are too strong for the ministry, because so many interests in the kingdom are connected with them."

But now the case is changed. Over-trading, the wild spirit of

But now the case is changed. Over-trading, the wild spirit of speculation, the undue expansion of credits, enormous investments in premature enterprises, have worked out their legitimate and inevitable results, and with a full volume of paper money the crash came; prices have fallen, settling day has arrived, painful liquidation proceeds, and the whole commercial and financial fabric is settling down on a solid foundation. Experience convinces where precept falls only on deaf ears, and to-day we have men by the thousand longing and asking for a return to specie, who, three years ago, would have vio-lently opposed it. To attempt now to build up business by further inflation of the currency involves a theory so wild and destructive that it requires a man of great nerve or of great ignorance to propose it. It requires a man of great herve or or great ignorance to propose it. Indeed, the shock to confidence by the panic of 1873 was so great that many commodities, and especially many fabrics, are below their normal price, and a firm, clear, decisive step in the direction of a sound, redeemable currency, imparting stability to our financial system and confidence to the people, would, in the judgment of our best merchants and manufacturers, be followed by a rise in prices, by a quick and widespread demand for labor, and by a generous and general revival of trade and business throughout the country. And beyond that we should enter upon an export trade in our fabrics such as we have not dreamed of in the past. The time is ripe for it, outward circumstances are all propitious, and it only remains for Congress to give to the country a steady currency, and the bounding energy and enterprise of our people will do the rest.

There is not a cotton-plantation in the South, not a grain or grazing farm in the West, not a coal-pit or iron-furnace in Pennsylvania or Ohio, not a manufactory in New England, not a ship-yard on the Atlantic coast, not a lumber-camp from the Penobscot to the Columbia, not a mile of railway between the two oceans, that would not feel the quickening, gainful influence of a final and general acquies-cence in measures looking to specie payment. The republicans medi-tate no harsh, or hasty, or destructive policy on this queston—but one that shall be firm, considerate, and conclusive. The democracy, by refusing to co-operate in the good work, can keep the matter in agitation and prolong the era of dullness and inactivity in the country. Having stubbornly refused to vote for legal-tenders when the salvation of the Union demanded them, that party can now fittingly complete its financial record by resisting all honest efforts to restore the specie standard to the people.

We are told, however, Mr. Chairman, in tones of most solemn warnwe are tool, however, Mr. Charman, in tones of most solemn warring, that this country is not able to maintain its paper-money at par with coin. Sir, I reject the suggestion with scorn, and it seems to me if I could be persuaded of its truth I should be ashamed to rise in the American Congress and proclaimit. Here is California, one of our youngest States, (thirty members of the Union being senior to her,) with a vast territory and a sparse population, able to maintain coin payment, and maintaining it through a financial storm of terrific force, and by reason of it regaining a position of solvency and safety with a rapidity and a certainty to which the paper basis affords no parallel but only a contrast. Here to the north of us lies the Dominion of Canada, stretching from Newfoundland to the borders of Alaska, with an inhospitable climate, a soil in great part inferior to ours, commerce checked and suspended half the year by frozen rivers, manufactures scant, crude, and undeveloped, with a population throughout the whole territory not so large as that of New York, and with wealth greatly inferior to that of the Empire State; with a debt as large, in proportion to people and product, and property, as our own; and yet Canada finds no difficulty in maintaining specie payment. And at Toronto, Montreal, and Halifax the American tourist is mocked and made ashamed by the sight of coin dollars and gold eagles from our own mint, circulating freely as currency among a people whose wealth and resources are but an inconsiderable fraction of our own magnificent inheritance and

When the National Government was organized in 1789 the most liberal estimate of the property of the entire thirteen States placed it at six hundred millions of dollars-less than the wealth of Boston or at six hundred millions of dollars—less than the wealth of Boston or of Chicago to-day. The population was four millions, showing a property of one hundred and fifty dollars to each inhabitant. By the census of 1870 our population had increased to thirty-eight millions and our wealth to thirty thousand millions, showing eight hundred dollars per capita for the whole people. Our population had increased in the eighty intervening years not quite tenfold, but our wealth had increased fifty-fold. The patriots of 1790, with their slender resources, did not hesitate to assume a national debt of ninety millions of dollars, heing more thin one seventh of their entire possessions; and it never being more than one-seventh of their entire possessions; and it never occurred to them that an abandonment of the specie basis would make their burden lighter. They knew from their terrible experience with continental currency that all their evils would be painfully increased by a resort to paper money. And in their poverty, with no accumuby a resort to paper money. And in their poverty, with no accumulated capital, with manufactures in feeblest infancy, with commerce undeveloped, with low prices for their agricultural products, they maintained the gold and silver standard, they paid their great debt, they grew rich in the property which we inherited, but far richer in that bright, unsullied honor which they also bequeathed to us.

To-day, the total debts of the American people, national, State and municipal, are not so large in proportion to already acquired property as was the national debt alone in 1790. And when we take into the account the relative productive power of the two periods, our present burdens are absolutely inconsiderable. When we reflect what the rail-way, the telegraph, the cotton-gin, and our endless mechanical inventions and agencies have done for us in the way of increasing our capacity for producing wealth, we should be ashamed to pretend that we cannot bear larger burdens than our ancestors. And remember, Mr. Chairman, that our wealth from 1790 to 1870 increased more than five times as rapidly as our population, and that the same development is even now progressing with a continually accelerating ratio. Remember, also, that the annual income and earnings of our people are larger than those of any European country, larger than those of England, or France, or Russia, or the German Empire. The English people stand next to us, but we are largely in advance of them. The annual income of our entire people exceeds six thousand millions in gold, and despite financial reverses and revulsions is steadily increasing.

In view of these facts, it would be an unpardonable moral weak-ness in our people—always heroic when heroism is demanded—to doubt their own capacity to maintain specie payment. I am not willing, myself, to acknowledge that as a people we are less honorable, less courageous, or less competent than were our ancestors in 1790; still less am I ready to own that the people of the entire Union have not the pluck and the capacity of our friends and kinsmen in California; and last of all would I confess that the United States of America, with forty-four millions of inhabitants, with a territory surpassing all Europe in area, and I might almost say all the world in fertility of resources, are not able to do what a handful of British subjects, scattered from Cape Race to Vancouver's Island, can do so easily, so steadily, and so successfully.

Mr. Chairman, one great trouble in this whole financial question has been the general and for many years the growing disposition of our people not to regard the legal-tender note as a debt of the Government, but rather as something which is never to be paid. Such was not the feeling among the people when the legal-tenders first appeared, and I think this erroneous and injurious conception resulted appeared, and I think this erroneous and injurious conception resulted from an act of Congress, which in a most vital point changed the character of the notes. When the first three hundred millions of legal-tenders were issued, they couldbe funded at the option of the holder in 5-20 bonds in sums of $50 and any multiple thereof. This provision gave a fixed, determinate character to the legal-tender, connected it with other Government issues by an equated value, made it on intermal part of our whole exptens of public conditional made. it an integral part of our whole system of public credit, and established it, in short, as a sort of balance-wheel to our somewhat comlished it, in short, as a sort of balance-wheel to our somewhat complicated financial machinery. So long as that provision was in force the money of the people was precisely as good and just the same as the money of the bondholder. By a mistaken policy, as I venture to affirm, this section of the law, on the request of Secretary Chase, was repealed after due notice given, and the moment that was done the legal-tender became a sort of financial orphan among us; it had thenceforward no connection or relationship with any other issue by the Government; it measured nothing itself and was measured by nothing, and ever since that day it has had to fight its own battle, not merely unsided by other forms of public credit, but in a sense not merely unaided by other forms of public credit, but in a sense constantly hindered by them. To establish a fixed, steady value for it under these circumstances were as impossible as to determine a pound avoirdupois without reference to the law of gravitation.

Congress having taken away the provision for redemption, the public have naturally come to regard the legal-tender as perpetually irredeemable; and one of the first steps toward resumption is to change that impression, by reviving the funding privilege, in a bond of lower rate, with extended time, and a limitation on the amount that could be funded in any given period. As an amelioration to the debtor class, the suggestion has been made that the bonds into which the legal-tenders should be thus converted, might themselves be made a legal tender for all debts contracted prior to the passage of the act. This featender for all debts contracted prior to the passage of the act. This feature may have merit, but I should desire to consider it very fully in all its bearings before assenting to it, and especially as to its effect on the value of the legal-tender note, and also as to its constitutionality.

We have done much to maintain our public credit, but I think we began at the wrong end when we made special exertion to raise the price of our bonds and left the legal-tender to take care of itself. Had we devoted our energies to bringing the legal-tender to par with coin the bond would have followed; but, unfortunately, we have found that the reverse is not the case. For myself, I confess I always feel ashamed to see our bonds quoted at a large premium, while our legal-tenders are at a heavy discount; and while there has been no little demagoguery about the bondholding class getting their pay in coin as the law directs, I have wondered that the mass of our people so quietly endure being deprived of gold for their legal-tenders as the law in its spirit

But whether we shall succeed or shall fail in restoring to the United States notes the funding privilege with which they were originally endowed, I must here record my earnest protest against the policy of repealing the legal-tender clause which has given to these notes their great strength as a circulating medium. I cannot see how the Government can consistently deprive these notes of their legal-tender quality until it is ready to redeem them in coin on presentation; and when it is so ready to redeem them, what need or advantage will there be in raising the question? And I have never heard any argu-ment at all satisfactory to my mind that the repeal of the legal-tender clause would tend to make resumption easier. On the contrary, it seems to me that it would render resumption far more difficult than it will otherwise prove; that it would throw an undue share of the burden on the banks; that it would force them into the most rigid contraction and needlessly cripple their power of discount; thus plunging the whole country into confusion, disturbing credits, embarrassing payments, fatally deranging business, and creating widespread distress among the people. It would be a peculiarly severe blow to the debtor class, and would make resumption to them the signal of bankruptcy and ruin. All wise legislation toward resumption will take care that no needless burden be thrown on those who have debts to pay, and that in the transition the banks shall be kept in such a condition as will make them as helpful as possible to the business community. But this policy would drive the banks into a struggle for self-preservation in which debtors would necessarily be sacrificed. If I correctly apprehend the sound public judgment on this question, there is no desire to destroy the legal-tender character of the note, but a settled determination to bring it to par with coin burden on the banks; that it would force them into the most rigid of the note, but a settled determination to bring it to par with coin, and by this means bring every bank-note to the same standard. This policy will restore the coin of the country, of which we are producing over eighty millions per annum, to active circulation in the channels of trade, and will result not only in making our money better, but assuredly more plentiful among the people. It is a humiliating fact that, producing as we do a far larger amount of precious metal than all the rest of the world beside, we drive it into export because we will not create a demand for it at home. And the miners of the Pacific slope are furnishing the circulating medium for every country of the civilized world except their own, whose financial policy to-day outlaws and expatriates the product of their labor.

The act providing for resumption in 1879 requires, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, some additional legislation to make it practical and effective. As it stands, it fixes a date, but gives no adequate process; and the paramount duty of Congress is to provide a process. And in all legislation looking to that end it must be borne in mind that unless we move in harmony with the great business interests of the country, we shall assuredly fail. Specie payment can only be brought about by wise and well considered legislation, based on the experience of other nations, embodying the malation, based on the experience of other nations, embodying the matured wisdom of the country, healthfully promoting all legitimate business and carefully avoiding everything that may tend to create fear and distrust among the people. In other words, what we most need as the outgrowth of legislation is confidence, public and private, general and individual. To-day we are suffering from the timidity of capital, and so long as the era of doubt and uncertainty prevails, that timidity will continue and increase. Store toward inflation will release timidity will continue and increase. Steps toward inflation will make it chronic; unwise steps toward resumption will not remove it. We shall have discharged our full duty in Congress if we can mature a measure which will steadily advance our currency to the specie standard, and at the same time work in harmony with the reviving industries and great commercial wants of the country.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, whatever we may do, or whatever we may leave undone on this whole financial question, let us not delude may leave undone on this whole financial question, let us not delude ourselves with the belief that we can escape the specie standard. It rules us to-day, and has ruled us throughout the whole legal-tender period, just as absolutely as though we were paying and receiving coin daily. Our work, our fabrics, our commodities, are all measured by it, and so long as we cling to irredeemable paper we have all the burdens and disadvantages of the gold standard, with none of its aids and gains and profits. "The thing which hath been is that which shall be." The great law-giver of antiquity records in the very opening chapters of Genesis that "the gold of the land of Havilah is good." And, with another precious metal, it has maintained its rank to this day. No nation has ever succeeded in establishing any other standard of value: no nation has ever made the experiment except at ard of value; no nation has ever made the experiment except at great cost and sorrow; and the advocates of irredeemable money to-day are but asking us to travel the worn and weary road, traveled so many times before—a road that has always ended in disaster and often in disgrace.

Mr. TARBOX. Mr. Chairman, I have listened, the House has listened, and the country will listen with attention and respect to what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] has uttered. His eminent position in the party of which he is an acknowledged leader, his position as one long experienced in public affairs, justly challenges for him the attention not only of this deliberative body but of the whole country when he makes his deliverance uponsubjects of public importance. I have listened, sir, for instruction; for I know the gentleman can speak well and wisely when he will. But in this discourse, it seems tome, he evinces rather the spirit of the advocate than the spirit of the savan. Still defending criminals! His speech is an attempted vindication of the financial policy of the party that has ruled the country without let or hinderance since the flowers of peace blossomed on the spears of war, and an attempted impeachment of the political action of that party which since that time has had no power at all in the counsels of the country so far as to shape it legislation or its administrative policy. In what the gentleman advances of the mischief already wrought and the mischiefs that menace in prospect the honor of the country and the welfare of its people from the unconstitutional and treacher-ous currency which his party forced upon our commerce, I entirely concur. I fully agree in the expressed need of a return to a gold ba-That we are not anchored there already is a mortification to the country, a shame to the party and the lawgivers who have controlled the policy of the country ever since that fatal mistake was made when we cut loose from a policy based on gold as the standard of value in the exchanges of trade.

But this, sir, is only the scaffolding of his discourse. The substance and the marrow of his speech has more relation to a near political event of great importance to persons and to parties, affecting the political control of the country, than it has to the elucidation of any problems of public policy in aid of legislation here.

He reviews what he is pleased to term the political history of the currency question and seeks to assail the democratic party for its part in that history. Why, sir, the democratic party has had no hand in currency question and seeks to assail the democratic party for its part in that history. Why, sir, the democratic party has had no hand in the fashioning of that history. It is the work of the republican party now in power; and if it needs to have any apology, that apology needs to come from the other side of the House; and the gentleman in his speech to-day has sought to make that apology. I propose ere I close to discuss the merits and the soundness of that apology. Ay, sir, I repeat, from the legal-tender act, the origin, the fountain of our financial columities down to the act of one year ago, that wratched for leaf cial calamities, down to the act of one year ago, that wretched fig-leaf cover of the nakedness of the republican party, that party has made this history; and by that record it shall be judged and its deserts

To begin with, the gentleman defends the legal-tender act as meritorious and wise. Had he made excuse for that act, urging that it was passed in a time of great financial stress when statesmen lost their heads and were carried away by panic, and that it was done for a patriotic purpose, I would have admitted weight to his excuse; I would concede that the statesmen of that day should have the benefit of a lenient construction of their blunder. But when he seeks to gather from the adoption of that weak financial expedient laurels to wreathe the brows of the party that is responsible for it, and would invoke odium on the democrats of that day who opposed it, then he frames an issue which we are not loath to meet.

It is conceded that the legal-tender act was unconstitutional. We know what dire results have come from it. And what is the excuse and the justification offered for it? The gentleman tells us that the country was in great financial perplexity; that its Treasury was nearly bankrupt; that the safety of the nation—ay, that is the term, and I have heard it before; it is the convenient cover for many and many an outrage on constitutional liberty and the welfare of the ple—that the safety of the nation demanded it. Sir, I deny it. England in her twenty years of suspension of specie payments never ventured to that length. She did not dare to make her bank-notes legal tender and thus change the fixed standard of values and unsettle

Doubtless our rulers in 1862, wiser in their own conceit than the wisdom of experience, thought by the legal-tender act to give value o the notes and save them from depreciation. But the notes after being given the legal-tender quality were no more money than they were before. They met the assured fate which inevitably waits on all paper issue not convertible with coin.

The attempt to force value into them by coercive legislation failed The attempt to force value into them by coercive legislation failed conspicuously. And just here I venture to say that the scheme urged by some to appreciate the "greenbacks" by making them receivable for customs, for a like reason, if tried, will fail of the object. The only result can be to diminish the Government revenue by the difference between the value of gold and the value of legal-tenders and to send more gold abroad. For, sir, gold will not stay idle. If it cannot find employment here, it will seek employment elsewhere.

One exhibit the gentleman makes furnishes a most striking illustration of this truth. He says that when the issue in 1862 was $150,000,000 it would buy more gold and therefore was worth more than the $400,000,000 of legal-tender issue in 1864; that is, the more money the Government issued the less it had. And still the debt grew.

money the Government issued the less it had. And still the debt grew, sir, and to that fatal policy of irredeemable paper issue by the Government the country to-day may charge the addition of a burden of at least $1,000,000,000 to the public debt, under which the industry of the country suffers and must suffer.

An able student of political economy in discussing this legislation very forcibly, as I believe, puts the correct proposition. I quote from Professor Sumner, of Yale College. Speaking of this particular legislation and the debate which preceded its enactments, he says:

The spirit of debate was that of panie. The finances had been allowed to drift into a serious condition, and then, instead of applying cool and calm reason to find out and correct mistakes, recourse was taken to the last and most desperate resource. The financial interests of a great nation for an indefinite future were staked upon the desperate resource to tide over a temporary exigency. When the lessons of history were quoted they were answered by the flag and eagle. When objection was urged in view of possible contingencies, it was answered by prophecies of military success and denunciations of rebels. When the need of deliberation was urged, it was answered by clamor in regard to the necessities of the Government. When it was said, irredeemable paper had always wrought ruin, it was answered that our resources were unlimited, and that these precedents did not make a rule for us. When it was prophesied that the paper would depreciate and we would not be able to retrace our steps, the prophets of evil were indignantly pointed to the plighted faith of the United States, and asked if they thought that would be violated.

The question whether it is necessary to issue legal-tender notes is a question not of law, but of political economy, and political economy emphatically declares it never can be necessary. All history shows that paper money with a forced circulation is not a temporary resource. It cannot be taken up and laid down as we choose. It is a mischief easily done, but most difficult to cure.

Sir, the gentleman from Maine and his political associates are well-

Sir, the gentleman from Maine and his political associates are welcome to all the glory of this financial policy, as they are responsible for all its results. The democrats who opposed this ruinous policy out of reverence for the Constitution and fidelity to economic laws, which can never be broken with impunity, may well trust to the judg-ment of their countrymen and the verdict of posterity for the vindi-

But, sir, the gentleman waxes eloquently virtuous over the dishonorable suggestion that the democrats or anybody else may violate the plighted faith of the nation contained in the law which limits the issue of greenbacks to $400,000,000. Suppose I admit his proposition that that law is a pledge of public honor; that to violate it would be a national disgrace. Then, sir, he convicts his own party out of his own mouth. The original legal-tender act, by which the Treasury notes were first made legal-tender, contained the self-same proviso of limitation that the issue should never exceed $150,000,000. His party broke that pledge of public faith, and his lips were mute of their eloquence to rebuke it.

To be sure, sir, I make no personal application of the suggestion. The gentleman, when that pledge was broken, I believe was the Speaker of this body, and since I have come here I have learned something I never imagined before, and that is that the Speaker of this House is not responsible in any degree for the legislation done here, even though that legislation come from the very committee of which

Now the gentleman says apologetically for his party, when he attempts to answer why, having control of all branches of the Government, this and the other branch of Congress by a two-thirds majority, his party has not put us squarely on a sound financial basis, that they could not do it. To be sure they make the answer of democratic opposition, but it is weak and pusillanimous, unworthy of serious reply, for a party controlling both branches of the legislative body by a two-thirds majority, with the national Administration in sympathy with them, to urge any such miserable plea as that.

But he says they could not. Why? Because of the condition of the country. It was impossible, it was not practicable to adopt measures for specie resumption while the business of the country was going or proportionally. ing on prosperously. We had to have a crash, a business depression that should beat the very life out of the business community and leave it prostrate. Such a penitential state of affairs as that was necessary,

Well, sir, we got that crash. It came in 1873, in the early autumn of that year, before the Forty-third Congress had assembled. It lasted through all the active life of that Congress; ay, sir, and during a year and more of this depression in business, this very condition of commercial affairs which the gentleman argues as favorable for a measure for specie resumption to compel public approbation, not one step was taken in that direction. Ay, sir, and when the country had languished in the depths of business depression for over a year this Congress, under complete republican control, passed a bill to augment the currency volume, which only failed to become a law by the interposition of the executive veto. That is the history of what the republican party has done in the management of the finances. Now, republican party has done in the management of the mances. Now, sir, suppose this: Suppose this Congress should neglect to pass any financial legislation and leave the country just where the republican party left it, and leave the country to realize to the full the results of the republican policy, would it lie in the lips of the gentleman from Maine or his political associates to complain?

Now, sir, further, one charge the gentleman makes is so unjust, so monstrous, and so uncandid that I will not characterize it further lest monstrous, and so uncandid that I will not characterize it further lest I exceed the limits set by the decorum of debate. I understand the gentleman to allege that the democratic party in 1868 proposed an almost illimitable issue of legal-tenders. I suppose he rests that allegation, for there is no other warrant for it possible, upon the resolution of the democratic national convention of 1868, in regard to the payment of the public debt, or certain portions of the public debt, with greenbacks. Now, sir, I appeal from the gentleman defending his client and attempting to convict an opponent, to the record itself.

I read, sir, the resolution adopted as one of the planks of the democratic party in its national convention in 1868:

Third. Payment of the public debt of the United States as rapidly as practicable; all moneys drawn from the people by taxation, except so much as is requisite for the necessities of the Government economically administered, being honestly applied to such payment; and where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face or the law upon which they were issued does not provide they shall be paid in coin, they ought in right and in justice to be paid in the lawful money of the United States.

The proposition involved in this is simply that that portion of the public debt which by its terms, expressed on its face, which terms were made by the republican party, is payable in lawful money, should be paid in that which the republican party through its legisla-

Now, I do not stand here to defend that proposition at all. I do not discuss it. I simply say: If it was error, the republican party was responsible for it. Their law provided that the interest of certain debts should be paid in coin, and that the debt itself should be paid in lawful money. The law which created the debt contemplated the payment of the interest and principal in different currencies. Else why the discrimination in the law? If we fell into a pit the republican party dug it, and are responsible for our fall. But, sir, there was no hint of inflation. There was no suggestion in that resolution of any new issue of greenbacks. The very terms of the resolution determined what the resolution intended. It said that the debt should be paid-how? Not out of a new issue but out of the greenbacks that be paid—how? Not out of a new issue but out of the greenbacks that remained in the Treasury after the payment of the current expenses of the Government. That was the fund out of which the debt was proposed to be paid, and not from any new issue of legal-tenders. What is the argument of the gentleman? Why, as at that time there were outstanding against the United States sixteen hundred millions of 5.20 bonds, and this resolution proposed to pay them in greenbacks, therefore any the gentleman to therefore, argues the gentleman, we were to issue sixteen hundred millions of greenbacks to pay them with. Why, sir, that sort of logic would be laughed down in any primary-school room in the country.

We propose, sir, and the gentleman from Maine proposes, and the country proposes, to pay the debt of the country in gold. But he does not contemplate, nor does anybody contemplate, that in order to pay our two thousand millions and upward of debt we are to use two thousand millions of gold coinage to do it with. It would exhaust

Again, sir, the alarm is sounded that the democrats of the North and of the South have formed an alliance. Well, sir, I confess the But whatever peril that alliance may threaten to individaniance. But whatever peri that alliance may threaten to individ-ual ambition or partisan success, there lurks in it no element of peril to the public welfare of the country. The alliance has no meaner ob-ject than the restoration of the Union upon the basis of loyal amity and constitutional law. We do not invite here the representatives of the South as inferiors, but welcome them here as our peers and or the South as interiors, but welcome them here as our peers and equals, equally honored, equally endowed in this council-chamber of a common government. And let me tell the gentleman, what he seems slow to recognize, that this compact is made not between men as partisans, North and South, but by the people of all sections, and that this league of perpetual union is to be welded so firmly under the warmth of the spirit of concord now abroad in the land, that it shall be beyond the selfish intrigues of political ambition or political well-gritted broads it. malignity to break it.

Why, sir, since I have occupied a seat upon this floor I have been brought in contact with and associated in public and private with those gentlemen of the South who sit here representing a part of the people of my country. I have heard from them in public and in private no disloyal word. So far as the future of the country is convate no disloyal word. So far as the future of the country is concerned, so far as their purposed action hereafter goes, they are as loyal to the flag, as loyal to the Government, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] or myself. I grant you, sir, they may differ from us in opinion as to the facts of accomplished history; they may differ from us in their estimate of the character of individuals. I care not who they admire or approve, whether it be Jefferson Davis or the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Blaine.] Every man has a right to his own personal admiration and attachments, nor do I care what they may believe as to the facts of Andersonville. That is history, sir: matters believe as to the facts of Andersonville. That is history, sir; matters upon which any man has the unquestioned right of private judgment without thereby having his loyalty impeached.

Sir, I remember that in 1860 Jefferson Davis was introduced to a Boston audience by a distinguished gentleman who, if not loyal enough to be made a judge of our Supreme Court, was loyal enough to be sent as minister to Spain, Caleb Cushing, "as eloquent among the eloquentest in debate, wise among the wisest in counsel, and brave among the bravest in battle-field." So far as I know, Caleb Cushing has never recanted that opinion of Jefferson Davis's personal qualities even unto this day. I remember also, sir, that General Butler, about the same time, in Lowell, Massachusetts, declared in a public speech that among all the eminent statesmen of the country, and he had looked them over carefully with a view of selecting the one most worthy of his vote, the statesman who stood pre-eminent was Jefferson Davis. Now, sir, if General Butler entertains that same opinion to-day, who cares? or how does that private judgment affect his loyalty one way or the other?

I suppose, sir, that the people of the North and the people of the South, of this generation at least, will differ in regard to the facts of the history of the late war. I suppose they will differ, and continue to, in their estimate of the virtues or demerits of the actors and events of that drama; but of that we must be tolerant. It does not go at all to the question of a man's loyalty and truth.

Now, sir, I do not propose to discuss the financial question at any length. I simply rose for the purpose of responding to that part of the speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] which attempts to speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] which attempts to appropriate undue honor to his own party, and to throw unmerited reproach upon the party to which I belong.

Sir, it would be uncandid and idle to dispute the existence of a wide diversity of views in the judgment of the political student and business communities of the country on this grave subject. When the gentleman claims that his party is united he claims what is foolish and absurd for him to claim. If he has any doubt upon that point I will refer him to the distinguished gentleman, the senior member of this body, who represents the Keystone State, [Mr. Kelley.] I would refer him to the opinions of the organs of his party in the West, notably such representative organs of the republican party as the Inter-Ocean of Chicago, and Toledo Blade, and the Cincinnati Gazette, and other papers of that character which do not concur in the opinion advanced here that the specie-resumption law should be maintained and vanced here that the specie-resumption law should be maintained and vanced here that the specie-resumption law should be maintained and measures for its enforcement carried out. Sir, the republican party and the democratic party are each divided within themselves on this question. The republican party a year ago, when it occupied this Hall in the pride and arrogance of absolute power, was unable to pass an effectual measure for resumption. The republican Congress was at direct odds with the republican Administration. We might as well be in some degree honest upon this question, even in the shadow of a presidential canvass. For myself, sir, I have a conviction formed from such reflection as I am capable of and from the counsels of the statesmen sages at whose feet I have been accustomed to sit for political instruction. I am for specie resumption, sure and soon. cal instruction. I am for specie resumption, sure and soon.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] patronizingly invites the

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] patronizingly invites the democrats who are in favor of resumption to join his party. Thanks. But what is the inducement? An early return to the gold basis? Is that the promise? What assurance have we if we go into your party that you will keep your promises? The gentleman says that the action of his party in the past is a guarantee of the future. Well, sir, the action of the republican party in the past has failed to command public confidence, and because of your policy in the past the country supplanted you to the extent of its power in the legislative council of the nation.

Now, sir, adopting the popular form of quotation, I wish to suggest a simple proposition in mathematics by which we can test the accomplishments of the republican party in the past while in power as a gage of its future if restored to power. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] gives the past as a guarantee. Sir, the security is not satisfactory. Adopting, as I have said, the popular form of quotation, gold was at 109 in 1870, and is 113 in 1876. Now, I challenge the best cipherer on the other side of the House to demonstrate a speedy return to specie payments from this mathematical proposi-tion. If in six years under republican rule we were four points further removed from specie payments, at the same rate of progress how long would it take us to reach resumption? When the gentleman shall elucidate that problem to my satisfaction and show as a result early specie resumption, then I will consider his proposition. But, in the meanwhile, even though our own hearthstone shall grow cold, still there is for us no hospitable warmth at the fireside under his political roof-tree.

I submit my judgment or conduct in a public trust to the absolute dictation of no political convention. I would sooner be thought in-subordinate as a partisan than treacherous to the public weal and dissubordinate as a partisan than treacherous to the public weal and disloyal as a citizen. Fortunately I am put to no such test of virtue, no such ordeal of choice. Loyalty to my political associations harmonizes with my convictions of what I owe to the common welfare. The last democratic national council at Baltimore spoke by authority the collective will of the democrats of the country in this emphatic assurance: "A speedy return to specie payments is demanded alike by the highest considerations of commercial morality and honest government."

This declaration I approved then, and I approve it now; not because it is the golden legend on the banner I follow on the field of politics, but because it seems to me to embody the true policy of industrial prosperity and public honor. I never had faith in the alchemy that boasts the power to transmute baser stuff into gold. I emulate not the adventurous spirit which explores the wilderness of speculation, so disastrous to all former explorers, in search of some royal road to plenty. Rather I would have the nation plant its feet firmly in the safe path worn by all successful experience, in which I am sure we shall not fall or stumble.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, to have listened for several days past to the remarks of various gentlemen on this floor who have at all addressed themselves to the details of this bill or any of the matthe details of this bill of any of the matters relating to it, one would suppose that the Committee on Appropriations had, with deliberation, been guilty of interfering with the commercial interests of the country, instead of, as I believe, exercising only a prudent economy. I say that in no degree have we interfered with any of the commercial interests of the people.

I approach this subject with no claim to superior self-knowledge. But I do assert that the Committee on Appropriations has given to this bill more consideration than I have known given during my service in Congress to any similar bill. Nay more, so far as I am concerned, I say deliberately that I have given much more time to the consideration of its details than was justified by the claims of other duties. It is well, therefore, for us to examine and see what the committee do recommend, and not run away from the bill and engage in a general condemnation of its supposed features, without a critical examination of the objects sought to be accomplished by it.

Now, in reference to the diplomatic agents of the Government, there are two points to be considered. The first point is in regard to their salaries. The committee deemed that the salaries paid to our their salaries. The committee deemed that the salaries paid to our agents abroad, of our ministers, were in disproportion to the salaries of our faithful agents at home; that not only were they disproportioned in amount, but there was an unjust discrimination in their favor by reason of the manner of payment. It may not be known to all gentlemen on this floor that our foreign embassadors, without authority of low simply by regulation receive the payments of their all gentlemen on this floor that our foreign embassadors, without authority of law, simply by regulation, receive the payments of their salaries in gold. Gentlemen will therefore readily see that, for instance, our ministers to England, France, Germany, and Russia today are each paid $20,000, or nearly that, per year, when you come to reduce his salary to the same standard applied to salaries paid at home. Allusion has been made to the period, long since, when our representatives abroad were of that character that we subsequently found necessary to make Presidents of. Let us for a moment compare the salaries then given to that class of men with the salaries given at the present time to the men now representing us abroad. At the time when Mr. Everett, Mr. Wheaton, Mr. Cass, and that class of men represented us abroad, they received a salary of $9,000 a year, an outlit of $9,000 and without authority of law, $4,500 for their return expenses. of $9,000 and without authority of law, $4,500 for their return expenses; that was the practice. Now, take that outfit and home-fit and consider the average duration of service abroad, which as I have been informed was three years; you will see that the Committee on Appropriations have in this bill placed the salaries of our ministers at a higher rate than they received at the time I allude to. We propose to give

Now, when we come to consider the fact that economy in every branch of the service is necessary, because we have not the means to pay excessive sums, and your Secretary of the Treasury in his communication to Congress has deliberately told you that frugality alone can save you from an empty Treasury, what is the course pursued by the other side of the House? When this side of the House attempts, in a reasonable, steady, and determined way, to reduce the expenditures of this Government, we are interrupted, obstructed, and sneered at by gentlemen on the other side of the House. Do you imagine for an instant that you are going to deceive any one by that course? Every toe that we tread upon brings forth a howl that we can hear. Gentlemen, you are not for economy; your profession is simply the word of mouth; no act of yours so far as yet seen upon this floor indicates the least sincerity of your professions in favor of economy. You always want economy to commence somewhere else except in the bill under consideration.

We have heard the suggestion that, instead of breaking up the South American missions, we should rather have broken up those in Europe; that we should have left the South American republics alone. Is the House aware of the fact that in 1869 a republican House of Representatives, so far as it was able to do so, ingrafted upon the law a resentatives, so far as it was able to do so, ingrafted upon the law a provision that these very South American missions should be consolidated almost precisely as we have proposed in this bill?

As to the European missions, I am willing to go with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hewitt,] and consolidate Denmark with Sweden and Norway. They are of one blood extraction; they are in harmonious according overnmental views and policy. We might have gone further, possibly, and recommended that Italy should be placed with Austria by a mission in common; but the committee were presented in that connection with the objection that the public policy of those Austria by a mission in common; but the committee were presented in that connection with the objection that the public policy of those two nations were directly at variance. We did agree to abolish the mission to Greece, and we did so with abundant reason. We were not only prompted to do so by our individual knowledge as to the utter uselessness of a mission there, but we had the word of a distinguished gentleman who held position in Greece under Mr. Lincoln's administration, who declared that the mission was utterly valueless either in a diplomatic sense as between nations or in connection with any commercial interests between Greece and this country. That any commercial interests between Greece and this country. That gentleman tells us distinctly that we might as well send a minister to the kingdom of Dahomey as to Greece; and I think this is good authority for what we have recommended in this connection.

We have not proposed the abolition of the mission to Portugal for state reasons, which will be perhaps apparent to everybody here. Portugal being bounded by Spain and the ocean, we wanted to have a representative there for purposes which are manifest to any one who will study the map and the events which are transpiring about us.

I have but a brief time, for I am anxious to get this bill passed and out of the way; but there are some things which I must of necessity notice. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Hewitt] laid particular stress upon our action in connection with the consulates in China, and the gentleman from Ohyo [Mr. Gappener] objected to the action and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] objected to the action of the committee in connection with China, Japan, and the South American States. Surely the gentlemen never stopped to inquire what we had really done in regard to those countries. How many consulates have we abolished there? You will be surprised, Mr. Chairman, when I tell you that we abolish but three consulates in China, but one in Japan, and but four in all South America, and these of the lowest class, the salary being but$1,000 each. And let me here say that our action with reference to those consulates is not calculated at all to interfere with the interests of commerce, because of the simple fact that we have remitted them to the fee system, which enables the President under the law, or even the consul-general nearest stationed, to appoint a person there to attend to any of our interests, if there is danger that those interests may be interfered with.

I want to notice in detail our action in regard to Chin-Kiang. We found that at that port the fees in 1872 were $3,300; that in 1874 they fell to $371-an enormous decline, and one which we thought should be inquired into. In making this inquiry we sought other advice and counsel than our own. We discovered that as far back as 1870 Mr. Seward, the consul at Shanghai, since promoted, I believe, as minister to China, recommended the abolition of this consulate. We have remitted that port to the fee system, because the trade, which has fallen off at that place, is carefully taken care of by the consul at Shanghai. The consulat Chin-Kiang formerly granted permits so that persons could go into the interior of China could relate the consulation of the consul permits so that persons could go into the interior of China and make sale of their goods. This was the sole benefit which resulted in the most prosperous times of that consulate. Now the same duty is performed by the consul at Shanghai.

The next consulate we have changed the character of in that country is that at Swatow. That is within the jurisdiction of the viceroy of Canton. The receipts there were in 1872 $679; in 1874 they had declined to $316. Hence we thought that post could be remitted to the fee system; and even if that should not answer, no possible harm can come, because the consul at Canton can attend to all the duties.

The third and last consulate in China that we propose to interfere with is that at Ningpo; and in regard to this port I want to give the House some information upon another point. In addition to the general reasons applying to the other places I have named, there was as to Ningpo a particular and additional reason. There has prevailed there a practice such as this: For a consideration of say $200 the consul has absolutely sold to native boats and crews from that port and various other places the American flag, which was used in assisting smuggling goods into the interior of China. And this character of business was permitted by the State Department, which seems to command so much respect on the other side of the House. So far as I am concerned I am willing to award to the State Department the credit of honesty in administration; but I say deliberately on this floor, after thorough investigation, that there is not a more extravagant Department in the Government. True, it has not the power to spend so much money as some other Departments of the Government; but what it has the power to spend it wastes as lavishly as any other, and their estimates seem recklessly made.

Let me say further that another distinguished gentleman formerly connected with the consuls in China, (I will give his name whenever it is asked,) approached some members of the committee and declared that it was of no earthly consequence to have a consul at Ning-po, and that the office ought to be abolished; and this was a gentleman distinguished in the consular service of this country under republican administration.

While we remitted to the fee system three consulates in China, what have we left behind? We have left five principal consulates in that country, and more than thirty officers in the consular service of various other grades.

I do not believe that either the consular system of the United States or our commerce with China is to suffer in the least degree by reason of these three changes recommended by the Committee on Appropriations. During 1874 the fees received at these consulates (and I do insist that such receipts are indicative of commercial importance) were only $1,260 in the aggregate at all three of these consulates, while the salaries paid out of the United States Treasury to the three consuls were $10,500. Certainly no member here will rise up and say there can be any necessity for such vast disproportion between receipts and expenditures. There is here no such commercial importance, no such amount of revenue as would justify any continuance of so large an expenditure on our part.

Expenditure on our part.

Let me come next to Japan. Hakodadi is on one of the Japanese islands, and most of the business transacted there is with Shanghai and Yokohama. So far as we have been able to learn, very few ships require the service of the United States consul at Hakodadi. If it should turn out in the future we do need a representative at that port in Japan, the power rests with the President of the United States or with the consul-general at Shanghai or Yokohama to provide the remedy. As to the particular case of the consul at Hakodadi, the only natural reason ever given to us why that consulate should be continued at expense to the United States Treasury was the one given to us by a gentleman who had the kindness to call into the committeeroom and state that his son was consul there and he did not want the consulate abolished. [Laughter.]

We next come to the consulates in South America. The first one we next come to the consulates in South America. The first one we propose to abolish is Guayaquil, in Ecuador. I should like to read something in reference to this consulate from a report made by a republican inspector of consulates. The committee have examined carefully the reports of these inspectors of consulates, although the gentleman from New York seemed to think that we had not read anything. One of these republican visitors and inspectors of consulates states as follows in regard to Guayaquil:

So, Mr. Chairman, we thought, and therefore recommended the consulate be abolished. In 1865 only one vessel arrived at Guayaquil, and between 1862 and 1865 there were no arrivals of American ves sels. Nevertheless this consulate has been kept up at a salary of $1,000 a year. We thought so long as there were so few arrivals of American vessels at Guayaquil, the average being only one in two years, that the consulate should be abolished and the port remitted to a consular agent with fees.

We come next to Rio Grande de Sul. This consulate, which we commended be abolished for the reasons already given, is in Brazil. We have also recommended the abolition of the consulate at Maranham. In reference to this place we have not been able to learn anything from the books, although we made most diligent search. It seems that this port of Maranham in former times was a place at which our vessels took refuge in distress. While we could find nothing in the state reports in reference to this place, we subsequently learned from a gentleman who had formerly been stationed at Maranham in our service that there was not in his judgment the slightest reasonable ground for keeping up a consulate there. He had experience as our consul.

The next place in South America which we proposed to abolish was the consulate at Talcahuano, in Chili. In former times it was an important place in some respects so far as shipping was concerned. The whaling vessels from New Bedford then made it a place of resort. Since that time a change has been effected, and our whaling-fleets now ren-dezvous instead at San Francisco. The occasion, therefore, has ceased for our whaling-vessels going so far south, and likewise the necessity for a consul there.

Gentlemen by looking at the facts and figures which I have given can see how far we have destroyed American interests in South America by the abolition of these four minor consulates. While we have only abolished four consulates in South America, we have allowed to remain various consulates in South America to the number of seventy. When gentlemen come to examine the whole subject in its details they will be able to discover to whom the charge of ignorance will apply, and to determine for themselves whether the committee was ignorant in this regard or the gentlemen who have spoken against this bill. It will be very apparant then that those gentlemen do not know quite as much as they thought they did in reference to these South Ameri-Where the self-assurance exists I do not believe can consulates. there can be any doubt.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to detain the House by going into detail in reference to all these consulates which we have proposed to change the character of; nor is it necessary just now, because when we come to consider the bill I will take the opportunity to give the fullest information to the House as each subject comes up on amendment under the five-minutes debate.

In my judgment all these consulates can be abolished and the duties remunerated by fees without the slightest commercial injury to this remunerated by fees without the slightest commercial injury to this country. The fees received at these forty-four consulates in 1874 were $11,086, while the salaries paid to the consuls at said ports by the United States amounted to $65,000! An opportunity to retrench was therefore furnished to the Committee on Appropriations, which, if that committee had not taken advantage of, it would have been derelict in the discharge of its duty to the country. We believe by saving this money and by the changes which we have made in reference to the consular and diplomatic system we present to the House a safe and proper bill. We invite gentlemen on this side of the House to walk in the way we have marked out, for there is safe ground to tread upon. The complaint which comes from gentlemen on the other side of the House is only part of a system on their part to prevent the accomplishment of the good purpose we have in view of retrenchment of the expenditures of the Government. I say here to-day, deliberately, that there is no doubt, in my judgment, if we are sustained in this House by our friends—and we mean to do no injus-tice—the total retrenchment and reduction of governmental expenses in connection with appropriation bills will reach more than $30,000,000. If there hopes for more, as I am of a sanguine temperament; but I say without fear to-day that if you gentlemen will let us alone, if you will not obstruct us, we will reduce the expenditures of this Government for the next fiscal year $30,000,000. And I promise you another. thing, that we will in no particular, as far as we are able, cripple the administration to the extent of one dollar. Now, why will you not let us do it quietly and peacefully without getting ruffled about it, as my friend over there did the other day? We mean to do it. We feel that we are right in doing it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Did the gentleman refer to me in the remark he made a moment ago.?

Mr. RANDALL. Neither the manner of your speech nor its substance, so far as I am concerned, warrants me in extending you any courtesy in the matter of interrupting me.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I shall not avail myself of any courtesy offered in that spirit.

Mr. RANDALL. Now the truth is that, when gentlemen come to examine the details of this bill, I will defy the most skeptical and the most critical in any part of the House to find a single flaw in it. And it is a remarkable fact that in the investigation of this subject the committee knew no political considerations; that, so far as I know, with two or three unimportant exceptions, with which such considerations had nothing to do, the committee were unanimous, and I have yet to hear any member on that side of the House, a member of that committee, attempt to find fault with the details of this bill. I think I have said all that is necessary at this time and I will not detain the committee any longer. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that we proceed to consider the details of the bill under the five-minute rule. I ask that

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition that by unanimous consent general debate shall now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition that by unanimous consent general debate on the bill shall now cease, and that the committee proceed to consider the bill by paragraphs for amendment under the five-minute rule?

There was no objection, and the Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The following paragraph was read:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Great Brit-ain, France, Germany, and Russia, at $14,000 each, $56,000.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I offer the following amendment: Strike out "$56,000," and insert "$65,000."

I offer this amendment for the purpose simply of saying one or two words with reference to some of the remarks made by my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] It will be recollected, sir, that I took occasion the other day to make some general remarks sir, that I took occasion the other day to make some general remarks with reference to the impolicy of doing anything, either through this bill or in any other way, which would impair to the least extent our proper efficient representation abroad. With reference to the consulships more especially, I said what I did in the interest of the foreign commerce of our country; not for the purpose of antagonizing the Committee on Appropriations in its very laudable and proper effort to reduce the extravagant expenditures of the Government. I do not know, sir, of my own knowledge that this bill contains one item that I would not have assented to had I been a member of that committee. But informed as I was that there is a reduction of about thirty-two But informed, as I was, that there is a reduction of about thirty-two consulships out of a little over two hundred, I was inevitably drawn to the conclusion that in that reduction there was an injury done to the commerce of our country.

Now, sir, I go with the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in reducing the expenditures of the Government; and I do hope he will effect a reduction, as he says, of $30,000,000. But I will suggest to him that if he will apply the same percentage of reduction to the other appropriation bills as he has done to this, instead of $30,000,000 he will have a reduction of nearly $80,000,000. Out of $30,000,000 he will have a reduction of nearly $80,000,000. Out of a total aggregate expenditure of about thirteen hundred to fourteen hundred thousand dollars he proposes a reduction of 33½ per cent. on this one bill alone. Now, sir, the same ratio of reduction applied generally would produce a result which I am very sure the people of this country would be very glad to see, of a reduction of at least $80,000,000 in the total aggregate of expenditures. I think, sir, we will all concede, gentlemen upon this side of the House and gentlemen upon that side of the House, that the State Department has been administered with more economy, with less wasteful extravagance, with more purity of administration than any other of the Executive Departments of the Government. Therefore, sir, if in this Department we can reduce 33½ per cent., it does appear to me that we can go as high as 50 per cent. in the other Departments.

But, sir, be that as it may, I say now, as I said before, that if the bill were to reduce the expenditures of this Government a million dollars instead of $400,000, I never would give my consent if in that reduc-instead of $400,000, I never would give my consent if in that reduction I should do anything to impair the prosecution of the foreign commerce of this country; because, sir, notwithstanding the importance of our agriculture, of our manufactures, of our mineral resources, notwithstanding all those great products of our nation, which I duly respect and am conscious of their importance, yet what would then be not the site of the sit they be worth without a foreign commerce, without an opportunity to carry our flag and our products to every portion of the world, and without the necessary protection for that flag and that commerce when it reaches foreign ports with a people that must produce over what they can consume? Therefore I cannot consent to do anything here that would in the least degree impair that protection in the prosecution of that great trade and commerce.

Now, sir, I am not here to say that this bill does that. I am waiting to hear from the chairman of the committee when we come to the details of the bill, but so far as the general question is concerned I wish it distinctly understood that although I am an economist of the most rigid order I am not willing to do anything to dishonor or impair the usefulness of our foreign commerce abroad. I withdraw the

Mr. SINGLETON. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the gentleman from New York in the spirit of his remarks; and if I believed that this bill would have a tendency to impair the service of our Government abroad, by reducing salaries and abolishing some of these consulates abroad, I should be the last man on this floor to advocate such a proposition.

But I wish now to bring to the consideration of the House the insidious manner, the stealthy steps, by which the salaries of these foreign ministers have grown to proportions not at all in harmony with the times. When the salaries were first raised to $17,500 the services to be rendered embraced twelve months of honest, faithful labor. Afterward, to favor these officers, a law was passed, or it was a regulation of the State Department, allowing two months' absence from the post of duty, thereby requiring ten instead of twelve months' service. During this two months the salary continued to run at $17,500 a year or $1,458.50 per month; and the secretary of legation acting in the place of the minister receives one-half the salary of the minister for the two months, making $1,458.50, which, added to the $17,500, amounts to the sum of $18,958.50. Then, by an act of Congress or by courtesy of the State Department, one month's salary was allowed to the appointee before he left home, namely, $1,458.50, which, added to $18,958.50, made the ten months cost $20,417. And this minister after his term of office expires is allowed $1,458.50 for one month's salary his term of office expires is allowed $1,458.50 for one month's salary for the time he is returning to his own country, which adds still not less than one-fourth a month's salary, namely, $364.62\frac{1}{2}. Supposing the officer to continue in the position four years, add this to the $20,417, and it foots up for each ten months' service the exorbitant sum of $20,781.62\frac{1}{2}. It is true that the secretary of legation does not draw his salary while acting as minister. This amount, $416.66\frac{2}{3}, each year, which is his two months' pay, at the rate of $2,500 per year, is to be deducted from the $20,781.62\frac{1}{2}, which still leaves to the minister the net sum of $20,364.96 for each ten months' actual service. I should not say perhaps, that the minister gets the full amount of minister the net sum of $20,304.96 for each ten months' actual service. I should not say, perhaps, that the minister gets the full amount of the last-named sum, but rather that each first-class foreign mission costs the Government that sum, and the embassador actually pockets not less than $20,000 of it annually. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask if it does not require a good amount of cheek to ask this House to continue in this line of extravagance?

I propose now to show that under the bill reported by the committee cost first large minister receives at the rote of short $17,500.

tee each first-class minister receives at the rate of about $17,500, counting his services at ten months, and allowing him salary for one month at home for preparation, and one month's salary for return. A salary of $14,000 for ten months' service is $14,000; add to that $2,800 for the month of preparation and the month of return, and you have $16,800 for ten months' service, which is considerably in excess of the $17,500 for twelve months' service.

I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I move to strike out lines 8, 9, 10, and 11 of the bill, as follows:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia, at $14,000 each, $56,000.

In moving this amendment, sir, I claim to be as honest an economist as any man on the other side of the House. None shall ever, while I have the honor to have a seat here, justly connect me with while I have the holor to have a seathere, justly connect me with any real extravagance. But, sir, I believe it more honorable for this nation to abolish these high offices than to degrade them. I am not speaking of the men who fill them, but I am speaking of the offices themselves; and unless I am greatly mistaken this proposition is an themselves; and unless I am greatly mistaken this proposition is an impeachment so far as it goes of the spirit of the whole bill from the beginning to the end. I cannot justify it to reason or good policy. My friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] the gentleman of vigorous rhetoric from Illinois, [Mr. Springer,] or my musical colleague from New York, [Mr. Cox,] who kept the House dancing to his fiddle for one hour yesterday, would either of them blush to ask the highest or the humblest servant in their employ to take one cent less pay for any proper services than they were paid in the year 1855. Sir there any proper services than they were paid in the year 1855. Sir, there is not a man in this House who does not know that there is nothing which we eat or drink, that there is no service or accommodation we command from any person or subordinate, at home or abroad, that we can have for less money than we paid for the same in the year 1855. Now, the salaries of these four chief embassadors of the United States were fixed in that year by a democratic administration at $17,500 after careful study of the subject. No valid reason has been given for reducing them, and there is not a man who blacks the boots of any member of this House who will not say that in view of the present condition of the country it is petty economy and unbecoming the American people to reduce these salaries to $14,000 in the existing state of things. If the gentlemen suppose that this is the way to conciliate majority votes they are greatly mistaken or I am. The chambermaid who makes your bed and the man who waits at your table would say "it is mean" if you were to ask them to take less or even the same you if you were to ask them to take less or even the same you paid them twenty years ago; and this is as true in London, Paris, Berlin, and St. Petersburg as in Washington. Moreover, when the salaries of these ministers were fixed the salary of a member of Congress was also fixed at $3,000. You propose to leave your own pay now at $4,500. Why so?

Now, what has Congress done for the last two months? I believe this nation has suffered three hundred millions a year from a deprestation has surfered the number of the first state and we have reduced the salaries of half a dozen professors, more or less, in that institution, and abolished its military band! We have less, in that institution, and abolished its military band! also, without an act of Congress, adopted twine in the post-office de-partment of the Capitol instead of red tape, and thereby saved a little.

And a tariff bill has been introduced here so radical and crude in its proposed changes as to excite general apprehension.

Now that, in brief, is what this Congress has done so far? It seems to me, sir, that this paring down of salaries of American ministers at London, Paris, Berlin, and St. Petersburg is poor business, and not the sort of service and work which the American people expect and require of us.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. RANDALL. I call for a vote.
Mr. CHITTENDEN. I withdraw my amendment.
Mr. RANDALL. I object to the withdrawing of the amendment, but call for a vote on it.
Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment, or rather to amend the paragraph before the question is taken upon the motion to strike out. I move to strike out "$14,000" and insert in lieu "$17,500." That will restore the salary of our ministers to Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia to the rate at present in force. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] is to strike out the entire paragraph; my motion is to restore the salary to the amount now in force. I do not wish to discuss the matter further, but will ask for a vote.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 64, noes 101.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move to strike out "$14,000" and insert in lieu
"$15,000," for the purpose mainly of asking the gentlemen in charge of this bill if they have established the grade of salaries in it upon a principle of action by which we can stand; that is to say, with due reference to payments made for like services, either in the previous history of this country or in the actual history of other countries, or with reference either to the increase or diminution of expenses since with reference either to the increase or diminution of expenses since the existing grade of salaries was fixed.

By a question which I put to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] the other day, I desired to ascertain the principle upon which the committee had fixed these salaries. It was impossible for me to find out by an examination of the figures in the bill. If economy consists in cutting down every salary without discrimination, that I could understand. But in that case I must complain of the gentleman in charge of this bill that he has not carried out the rule of economy by cutting down these salaries to $1.000 a year because economy by cutting down these salaries to $1,000 a year, because upon that principle that would be greater economy than cutting them down to $14,000 a year. I assume that no gentleman who respects the honor or credit of his country desires to make that the principle the honor or credit of his country desires to make that the principle upon which this bill is founded and advocated; a sort of economy which consists in the mere reduction of expenditures without reason. I give the gentleman the credit, then, of having some principle by which what he calls economy is measured. What is that principle? Mr. SINGLETON. Do you wish an answer? Mr. KASSON. Certainly I do.

Mr. SINGLETON. Take the basis of $17,500 a year for our first-class embassadors abroad, and this bill as reported, giving $14,000 for ten months' services, with one month's pay before they go to their labors and one month's pay upon returning, would bring the salary up to more than $17,500, more than the amount which was received by our ministers when the act was first passed.

Mr. KASSON. Then I understand the principle to be that while they have reduced the salaries—

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. KASSON. I would prefer not to be further interrupted, for my

Mr. KASSON. I would prefer not to be further interrupted, for my five minutes will soon be out.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I wish to say that it is only within a few years that our minister to England had more than $12,000.

Mr. KASSON. If that is the principle upon which the gentlemen are acting, that they are in fact giving our ministers a salary of $17,500, then this bill is evidently a deception; it is not a reduction in salaries, but only a reduction of contingent allowances. Now, every man knows that the salary is for a year's services, and not for ten months only. If a man has leave of absence, it is only for a certain number of weeks; and some of our ministers are at their posts every week in the year.

And when the gentleman talks of a minister receiving a month's salary before he leaves this country, and proposes to take that into consideration in calculating the amount of subsequent yearly compensation, I would ask him if he does not know that some of our ministers have been abroad from six to eight years, and more?

The committee have attacked the salary of our minister to Italy, a gentleman without private fortune with which to supplement his salary and to enable him to respectably maintain his official position. He is a man who has been appealed to by two nations of the Old World to settle disputes between them, because of his high character and extensive learning in international law. They have reduced his salary, not as in the pending paragraph, but by one-third of the entire amount he now receives. amount he now receives.

Now I undertake to say that this bill has been so framed that none Now I undertake to say that this bill has been so framed that none but rich men can go abroad and represent our country under respectable official conditions. Our present system has resulted lately in sending worthy men to some places where it would be impossible for our representatives to maintain themselves respectably upon former salaries. When Mr. Rush represented us in England he hired a house for 450 guineas a year. Mr. Motley told me, if I am not mistaken in my recollection, that he paid £1,400 a year rent for a house to live in.

When the democratic party in 1855 and 1856 fixed the salaries of our ministers at London and Paris, they fixed them at $17,500 a year, abolishing outfits and infits. Now they propose to make a reduction of $3,500 in that old democratic salary. When I ask for the principle upon which this is done, I get no information as to the principle of economy which regulates these matters. The question is left in just this position: that when democratic representatives were sent abroad this position: that when democratic representatives were sent abroad (and one of them who was for a term of years ending in 1861 the representative of a democratic administration at Parisis now a worthy colleague of ours on this floor) $17,500 a year was freely allowed, and no objection was made to the salary; but now when a republican represents there the honor and credit of this country, "economy" falls upon him and demands a reduction of $3,500 in his salary. I should have been glad to have heard—what would have been authorities of me on this floor-a declaration from that former representative of a democratic administration at Paris whether he found $17,500 too much to enable him to represent his country creditably there? If he will say that he found $17,500 too much, I shall not ask that the salary be maintained where it is at present and has been for twenty years.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for a vote.

Mr. KASSON. I withdraw my amendment, because if gentlemen on the other side are resolved to maintain the salaries named in the bill it is replication.

bill it is useless for us to present facts or reasons.

Mr. RANDALL. We will give you an opportunity to make a record in the House if you wish it.

Mr. KASSON. That has already been done upon one of these ques-

Mr. HOAR. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we have a right to demand that gentlemen on the other side of the House should give us some information in regard to the expense of an honorable and creditable maintenance in London, Paris, and the other two capitals mentioned in this paragraph. Nobody desires, I suppose, that a gentleman representing our Government in Paris or London shall be denied the means to become acquainted with the governing social life of the nations to which he is accredited. England is governed directly or indirectly by a hundred thousand families; and the man who knows the opinions and sentiments of those families. lies knows how to deal with the public opinion that governs England. As was well stated on this floor the other day, it was the social relations maintained by our envoy in that country that stopped the issuing of the rams in the darkest period of the late war and thereby prevented a war with England. When ordinary diplomacy failed, the envoy of this country devoted himself to two objects: first, to learn in private from the representatives of the influential classes whether they wanted a war with this country, and then to let them understand that they would have it if those rams went out. Nobody can expect that a minister representing this country abroad can receive from his fellows in the diplomatic corps or other residents of the country to which he is accredited attentions which he does not dec-country to which he is accredited attentions which he does not decorously and respectfully return.

Now, I should like to have the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] tell us how much a suitably furnished and equipped house of proper size for social and public entertainments costs in London or Paris when rented by the year. What is the cost of maintaining there a respectable and suitable style of living, such as is maintained by the representatives of foreign countries in this city? As was said by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson,] I would like to hear from the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] an honored and distinguished member of the democratic party, who represented this country in Paris as long ago as 1860, when prices were about half what they are now. I wish he would be good enough to inform us how much of his salary of $17,500 he had left at the end of the year. I have heard that he paid $7,000 for rent alone. I suppose in speaking of a public question it is not indecorous to allude on this floor to matters of this kind.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a vote.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Spain, Austria, Brazil, Mexico, Japan, and China, at $10,000 each, $60,000.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to commend one motion to the consideration of the gentlemen in charge of this bill. It is to insert before the word "Spain" the word "Italy." I beg the attention of the committee for a moment.

In the next succeeding clause Italy has been taken from the cateand has been put in a category by itself, this officer being the only minister who is to be paid at this rate. I submit to gentlemen of the committee, or gentlemen in charge of this bill, whether Italy, now united, a nationality of equal rank certainly with Spain, Brazil, and Mexico, ought not to be put in the same category where it has always been, leaving still the mission at a reduced rate of pay.

In making this motion I may be allowed to remind the committee again of the facts to which I alluded a moment ago, that the gentleman who represents this country in Italy is not able to supplement the legal provision for pay out of his private means. The proposition in the bill seems to single out a gentleman whom members on the other side of the House as well as on this admit to be one of our ablest representatives abroad putting him in a lower settorary by ablest representatives abroad, putting him in a lower category by himself, as if something in his history had subjected him to that im-

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say to the gentleman that in making up this bill no personal considerations entered the mind of any memup this bill no personal considerations entered the mind of any member of the committee. We could not take into consideration the question whether men of wealth or men of mederate means occupied particular places. When we reached Italy, the disposition of some members of the committee was to abolish that mission entirely. We have thirty-six consulates in that country; and I was among the number of those who deemed it advisable to abolish this mission. But, for the reason which I stated in the remarks I made awhile ago, the estrangement between Italy and Austria, so that we could not consolidate these countries into me mission, the Secretary of State I the estrangement between Italy and Austria, so that we could not consolidate those countries into one mission, the Secretary of State, I believe, consented to the reduction of the salary rather than have the consolidation take place.

Mr. KASSON. I need hardly remind the House, I trust, that we are also indebted to our minister in Italy for his study of a question that has been of great importance to us in the Western States, that of irrigation. For the most valuable paper on that subject ever presented to the people of this country, we are indebted to him and to his studies which he made in Italy upon it.

Italy is an important nation, ranking next to the five great powers of Europe. Already our personal relations with that country in the way of travel and study are very great. Our commercial relations are increasing. Many of our citizens go there as students of art. Many also go there as invalids; and in case of their death their estates are to be taken charge of. Thus there are various reasons why this legation should be continued. But the special point I make now is that the committee have taken this mission out of the category where it always has been kept, and have put it by itself.

Gentlemen will of course do as they please, and without their approval I should find it useless to make any motion. I have now simply to ask that they will put back this mission to Italy in the same category to which it belonged before, though with the reduced salary of that class

Mr. RANDALL. Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa that we cannot legislate for clever men, for men of intellect, but must look to the interests of the great mass of our people.

Mr. KASSON. Leave that question out altogether, for what I said was merely in passing. But I claim that Italy has a right to be classed with Austria, Spain, and Brazil, and I only ask it shall be put back in the same category where it was before.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one word in regard to this Italian mission and the necessity urged by the gentleman from Iowa to increase the pay of our minister at that court. The present minister has been there for many years, and any gentleman who may travel in Italy will find his office hours begin at twelve and end at two o'clock, while he seldom entertains Americans, Italians, or any-

Mr. KASSON. I beg to dissent from that.

Mr. SPRINGER. I speak of this matter because I know about it.
Mr. KASSON. My experience is entirely different from that of the gentleman, and I am sorry he did not have the same reception on the part of our minister I did.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman is going to engage in personalities, I hope this debate will be brought to a close, and we will go on with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. It was not my intention at all to drift into personalities, and I believe I have not done so.

alties, and I believe I have not done so.

Mr. SPRINGER. Since this personal matter has come up I want to say a word or two in that regard.

Mr. KASSON. I beg the gentleman not to refer to it in that way, as it was not intended to be personal. I honestly regretted the gentleman from Illinois did not have the acquaintance of the minister to Italy as I had and was not as agreeably entertained.

Mr. SPRINGER. I called at the American minister's office in Italy and found the rules in reference to his office hours on his door precisely as I have stated them. Besides I was informed by Americans who re-as I have stated them. Besides I was informed by Americans who re-as I have stated them. Besides I was informed by Americans who resided there that this gentleman was devoting all his time and energy to literary pursuits, while the American consul-general who lived at Florence did all the entertaining, and socially all that which it was incumbent upon our minister to do.

Now that this personal matter has been referred to I desire to call the attention of this committee to some remarks made this morning by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Hale.] I have asked the reporter, as I was not within hearing-distance at the time, to furnish me with what that gentleman did say. It was in reference to an assumed invitation extended by some of the Cabinet officers to the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] to dinner. Thereupon the gentleman from Maine was unkind enough to remark that "the constituents of the gentleman from Illinois would not have occasion to complain of him, because he would hardly have to receive or make acknowledgment of any such invitation." I do not know whether the gentleman has been authorized to notify me that I am to receive social ostracism from the members of this administration or not on account of my efforts to reduce the expenditures of the Government; but if I am to have notice served upon me and other gentlemen that we are not to be honored with invitations to dine with these gentlements. we are not to be honored with invitations to dine with these gentlemen in high places on account of our course on this and other bills, (because, as the Chair knows and I can assure the House, I have been exceedingly respectful to every gentleman here in my social intercourse and relations and careful that no personal offense should be given by me to any gentleman upon this floor,) if we are to have be given by me to any gentleman upon this floor,) if we are to have such notice served upon us, if we are to be socially ostracised by reason of our efforts to cut down expenditures in this Government, all I have to say to the gentleman from Maine is that we can stand it quite as well as they can. Moreover, it is no evidence of a man's integrity or manhood that he rides on the Avenue with those in high places or dines with those occupying high positions of power, or that he is the recipient of the hospitalities of those who have plundered this District and are now complaining because their days of peculation are at an end. Further than that, let me tell the gentleman that it is no evidence of a man's ability or character that he is permitted to dine in these high places with the people to whom he has referred, because men lately enjoying such privileges are now serving out terms in the penitentiaries, while others are on their way to join them as rapidly as the law can take them. [Laughter and applause.]

Here the hammer fell.

Mr. HALE. I want to say a word, and hope the amendment will Mr. HADE. I want to say a word, and hope the amendment will be withdrawn so I may renew it.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us go on with the bill; you have had a shot at each other. I insist on going on with the bill.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows I can make my motic: afterward. I wish to say only one word in this place.

Mr. RANDALL. You assaulted him and he struck back; that is all there is of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment, on which debate has been exhausted.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph. I do it solely for the purpose of saying that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Springer,] entirely misapprehended the scope of what I said this morning. Ldo not think anybody else understood me to be affirming here as a serious matter that invitations in Washington went by favor, depending on whether a man opposed or advocated reductions upon the different appropriation bills. If the gentleman had been here long enough, he would have known that no member here would advance any proposition of that kind. I have had something to do heretofore with striking down appropriations in the different Departments, and I never saw any difference in the estimation so far as I could observe, held of me by the heads of the Departments; and other gentlemen on this side and on the other side of the House, the chairman of the committee who now faces me, the witty gentlethe chairman of the committee who now faces me, the witty gentle-man from New York, [Mr. Cox,] the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman,] the veterans of the House, all know that these things have nothing whatever to do with social life. It is fortunate they have not. Dinner-parties are things that have existed for years, and will exist, and republicans in democratic administrations frequent the houses of officers of the democratic party. It would be a sad thing if it were otherwise. So when we meet at the houses of the cabinet ministers here, under one form or another of invitation or entertainment, it is a very pleasant thing for members of the two political par-ties to clasp hands on these occasions.

I made no suggestion of the kind the gentleman from Illinois has I made no suggestion of the kind the gentleman from Infinois has intimated. In a humorous bringing up of a supposed invitation to the gentleman from Indiana, I was moved to a thrust at the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Springer.] But if I have to repeat the reason why I was so moved, I will say that it was not because of his position with reference to the reduction of expenditures, but because yes-terday he thought proper to entertain the House with an apocryphal anecdote of Mr. Lincoln, which I considered was not seemly for this

Mr. SPRINGER. I have heard Mr. Lincoln tell that anecdote before better audiences than have ever listened to the gentleman from

Mr. HALE. I will not raise that question with the gentleman. But that is the reason I gave why, supposing the gentleman from Indiana might receive these pleasant invitations, perhaps the constituents of the gentleman from Illinois might find how he did not receive them. The reason why I said so was because the gentleman said here what he did yesterday, which I regretted to hear, and which I sup-what he did yesterday, which I regretted to hear, and which I suppose he now regrets himself having spoken.

Mr. RANDALL. Now that amity is restored I ask the Clerk to proceed with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HALE. I do.

The following paragraph was read:

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by striking out "$8,000" and inserting "$10,000."

It seems to me an exceedingly violent and unjust amendment to take a salary of $12,000, fixed so many years ago, and cut it down to $8,000. I do not believe this House can do that. I will not detain the committee by argument. I will say, however, while I have the floor, that it seems to me gentlemen have greatly underestimated the kind of influence that our diplomatic representatives are supposed to Laugh at it as we may, make as much fun of it as we may, a large share of the great affairs of the Government is settled in fact over din-ner-tables. This is true of caucus committees and committees of all sorts, and notably diplomatic agents find in the relations of social life the chief means of adjusting all great difficult international questions. Why here in the early days of our Government these questions of ceremony had far more to do with the management of affairs than they have now. For five days the administration of George Washington and all the strongest and ablest men about him were giving their extremest care and attention to the question of detail how they should receive a minister from France, and the regulations that were written out, which I have here in print before me, described minutely how that minister should approach in a coach and be met by two mem-bers of Congress in a coach, and which hand should be given to him, and which party should offer a hand first. All these minute details of social and diplomatic arrangements were considered of great state importance in those days. Silas Dean, one of the greatest of our old Americans, wrote back to Congress in the midst of the agony of our diplomatic arrangements with France—arrangements which resulted finally in the sending of a French fleet and a French army, and in our liberty being secured-wrote under date of December 3, 1776, speaking of Marie Antoinette, these words:

The queen is fond of parade, and, I besieve, wishes for war, and is our friend. She loves riding on horseback. Could you send me a fine Narragansett horse or two! The money would be well laid out. Rittenhouse's aviary, or Arnold's collection of insects, a phaeton of American make, and a pair of bay horses, a few barrels of apples, walnuts, cranberries, butternuts, &c., would be great curiosities.

Now, sir, why did not some of the wise statesmen and great economists of that day get up and make fun of all this? Why, sir, if my friend from Indiana [Mr. Holman] had been in that Continental Congress and had got hold of that rich tidbit, and if he had been followed by the witty gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Springer] in criticism of this letter, you would have seen our fathers shaking their big wigs with delight if they were the same sort of men as we are to-day. But our fathers saw that the fate of the nation depended on using all these social forces in the way the nations of the world used them, even in humoring the little frivolities of court life for the sake of reaching the spirit and character of the nation to which their minister was sent

Now it is proposed to cut down the salaries of our ministers by this bill so that a man can go into the fourth story of some boarding-house and just barely live through his term. He cannot accept any courpoor man, especially, he must be a boarder, a mere boarder in the city to which he is accredited.

Now, if gentlemen opposite will answer any of the points I have made on the subject I will vote with them; but, so far, they have answered none.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee on Appropriations have certainly approached this question of the mission to Italy without any personal consideration; indeed, but few of us, I think none of us perhaps, have any personal acquaintance whatever with the scholarly gentleman who represents us at that court. We understand, as the gentleman from Ohio must understand and know, that that place is a mere sine-cure; that we have no relations with Italy beyond treaties of amity and commerce. We have no political relations whatever, and quite limited commercial relations, and we have provided heretofore and still provide for an ample body of consuls to look after our commercial interests there, indulging in the belief, in the hope that the tendency toward free institutions among the people of Italy, which we have witnessed with so much pleasure for the last few years in that project empire of scholarship and liberty in olden times will find it. ancient empire of scholarship and liberty in olden times, will find it rather a pleasant thing that the United States in failing to send a minister there at the same time consults the interests of the people by supplying a sufficient force of consuls to look after the commercial interests existing between the two countries.

Mr. KASSON: The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will allow me to say that within a year past very important information touching our own laws and institutions has been asked for by the more liberal elements in Italy for the purpose of guiding the legisla-ture of Italy on certain points. Instead of being without political relations with Italy, they are more than ever looking to us for politi-

Mr. HOLMAN. I have mentioned time and again that gentlemen are forgetting all the time that we are not now in the Middle Ages. Business is now transacted not through ministers, but directly through the Departments of State of the two countries.

Mr. KASSON. I simply wish to dissent from that.

Mr. HOLMAN. All important business recently transacted between our Government and foreign governments has been transacted directly by our Foreign Office and the foreign offices of other countries or by by our Foreign Office and the foreign offices of other countries or by special commissioners, and if I wanted to single out a particular case I would refer to the fact that postal treaties were negotiated with foreign nations by the gentleman from Iowa himself, instead of our minister abroad. All important business to foreign governments is now transacted by special agents.

Mr. KASSON. I beg to say, with the assistance of the minister.

Mr. HOLMAN. My honorable friend when he made these treaties made them himself, without the assistance of any minister; and I repeat that all important events with foreign governments are now transacted by men of affairs, and not by politicians who for political services have been sent to foreign courts; and that remark applies to all political parties. A hundred years ago, when the American colonies were struggling for recognition, then the grand presence of men like Benjamin Franklin might be necessary at foreign courts, but we have got beyond that.

Sir these one hundred wears have been grand in the structure of the structure of Sir, those one hundred years have been grand in their results and achievements. The American Government now has no business with the sovereignty of courts, with a few men who guide and control public events abroad, but depend upon the solid foundations of the sovereignty of the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on Mr. GARFIELD's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to offer an amendment in line 18 by inserting after the word "Switzerland" the word "Greece;" so that it shall

For ministers resident at Portugal, Switzerland, Greece, Belgium, Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden and Norway, Turkey, Venezuela, and the Hawaiian Islands, at $6,500 each, $58,500.

Mr. Chairman, I do not deny that there is a public exigency for some legislation of this character, but the course which the debate has taken for several days in regard to the representation of this country at Greece admits a possibility of its being interpreted as a public censure on the minister of this country at that post, and I rise chiefly for the purpose of saying a few words in regard to that subject, with a hope of doing our minister there something like justice.

I understand that there is a wish on the part of the friends of this

I understand that there is a wish on the part of the friends of this bill that it be passed without amendment, and I trust that if I occupy a moment or two more than my allotted minutes the Chair will not notify me of the fact.

The minister to Greece (General Read) has been for a long time in the diplomatic service of the country at other posts. There is in my opinion no young man in the diplomatic service of the country who is more earnest, faithful, or capable than that gentleman. He was consul-general at Paris during the Franco-German war, and I am quite sure that he was earnest and energetic in the discharge of his duties there, and gave as much satisfaction to the Government as any other officer in the service. He was one of the officers employed, with the con-sent of the French and American governments, in giving protection to the citizens and subjects of twelve different European and American governments who were in France during the war. I think he was promoted to the post of minister to Greece in consideration of his honorable services in Paris.

Then, sir, in regard to the mission itself, it is not so unimportant a post as it has been represented in this debate.

One dispatch printed in the volume of diplomatic correspondence of last year has been the principal theme of criticism so far as reference has been made to the Grecian mission.

While we may very well concede that that dispatch was not important, yet it was certainly an eminently proper one. One of the duties of diplomatic representatives is to report from the several countries they represent the course of social as well as of political events. If hereafter there should be published reports of the representatives of European governments of the social affairs of this Govsentatives of European governments of the social analis of this covernment during the administrations of Washington and Jefferson, of Madison and Monroe, and even of Jackson, of which we know but little, it would be of great interest to the people as well as to the history of the country. This dispatch, I admit, was not an important one; but I want to say to gentlemen who have spoken on this question that because one dispatch is not deemed important, it does not follow that others may not have been received which were of important. follow that others may not have been received which were of importance to the Government.

Oftentimes diplomatic representatives make reports that it is not advisable for the Government to publish. Such was the case in regard to the French government during the events preceding and attending the war in this country. Among the dispatches from our minister to Greece there may have been many which the Secretary of State has not thought necessary or proper, with due regard to the public interests, to place in the volumes of the diplomatic correspondence of the country, but which, if known, would change the opinion of

Now one word in regard to the character of the mission itself. A mission abroad is not to be estimated upon the occurrences of a single We are to take a period of time, two or three years, or five or six, in order to determine whether or not the mission is of sufficient interest and importance to be continued. There are some circumstances connected with the mission to Greece which give it interest and importance. There was no agent, except that of consul, sent from the United States to Greece until 1855, when a citizen of Virginia was sent there as special agent during the administration of Mr. Pierce. In 1866, when the Cretan war broke out, the people of this country were interested in the efforts of that people to secure their independence from Turkey. It was thought a proper if not a necestive form the country were interested in the efforts of that people to secure their independence from Turkey. It was thought a proper if not a necestive form the country were interested in the efforts of that people to secure their independence from Turkey. sary course for the Government to send a minister there. It think the first person so appointed did not enter upon the discharge of his duties; I am not quite sure about that. At any rate there was a vacancy in 1868, when Mr. Tuckerman of New York was appointed.

Upon his arrival there he was received by the people of Greece with great enthusiasm in 1869. The presence of an American minister gave them renewed confidence in the success of the Cretans in their struggle against Turkey. It was to them as if Pericles had appeared to them as their leader. The metropolitan, the highest officer of the Hellenic or Greek church, waited upon him and made known to him, in the name of the Greek church and the Greek nation, their heartfelt thanks for the interest and support which the American people had given to their cause. They could not have continued their struggle for independence and liberty, he said, had it not been for the encouragement and sympathy they had received from the American people.

Sir, no such compliment as this has ever been paid to a representa-tive of this country by the people of any other government. It rep-resented not merely the Christians of Greece through their highest officer, but it expressed the sympathy of 75,000,000 Christians in the eastern part of the world for the American Government. A mission which has been thus honored cannot be considered altogether useless or unimportant either as it regards our own or other governments.

That is all I have to say. I want it to be understood that there is at least one member of this House who will not attribute to General Read any default in the performance of his duty, and who will not consent to any underestimate of the character and importance of the Greek mission.

the Greek mission.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to disavow on the part of the Committee on Appropriations any reflection whatever on Mr. Read. Neither his name nor his dispatches were mentioned or read in the committee. I know Mr. Read well. He was a boy while I was yet a young man, and all my personal feelings would prompt me to oblige him. But we approached this subject with a high sense of public duty; at any rate I did. Now in reference to this mission to Greece. In 1866 the mission to Greece was abolished by the repeal of the act of March 3, 1863. In so far as Greece was concerned it was stricken from the list of full missions. It was again revived in 1868 for reasons rather of a personal than of a public character. The reasons which prompted the repeal of the mission at the time I have named are in much greater force to-day than they were then; and the committee, therefore, irrespective of any personal consideration, propose to abolish that mis-

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman will allow me to say that the course of debate would imply another reason therefor.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite glad you have given me an opportunity personally to say what I have and to disavow any such reason.

Mr. BANKS. I want it understood that the vote, whatever it may be, shall not be considered as a reflection upon our minister there.

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot myself prevent these passages from his letters being read. They are his own dispatches, and he alone is responsible for them.

The question was then taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. Banks, and it was not agreed to upon a division—ayes 65, noes 94.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope not; let us first get through the diplomatic portion of the bill. The CHAIRMAN. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] that courtesy would require that the gentleman having charge of the bill shall indicate the time when the committee shall rise.

Mr. SINGLETON. It is now about five o'clock, and I would move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Singleton] having charge of the bill, agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. Dunnell,] the Chair will submit the motion as coming from him.

The question was taken on the motion that the committee rise; and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. Holman having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Hoskins reported that the Com-mittee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CAPTAIN GEORGE A. ARMES.

Mr. GLOVER. This morning the Speaker laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Judge-Advocate-General in the case of Captain George A. Armes, late a captain of the Tenth Cavalry, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed. I ask unanimous consent that the order to print be revoked.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 416) for the relief of C. H. Frederick, late a lieutenant-colonel in the Ninth Missouri Infantry.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on their amendment to the joint resolution of the House (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other puroses, had agreed to the committee of conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. Morrill of Maine, Mr. Thurman, and Mr. Sargeni as managers at the said conference on the part of the Senate.

REPRINTING THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the tariff bill intro-Mr. HOAR. Task disaminous consent that the tarm bill intro-duced by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. Morrison] be reprinted for the use of the House. Mr. RANDALL. There is no objection to that. There being no objection, the order to print was made.

BREAKWATER AT MOUTH OF AU SABLE RIVER, MICHIGAN.

Mr. BRADLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to this House the engineer's report of the survey and estimate for a breakwater at the mouth of the Au Sable River, Michigan, made pursuant to act of Congress making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1875.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Hurl-

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Ordered. That the petition and papers in the case of Lyman Guinnip be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

TWENTY-SECOND JOINT RULE.

Mr. BAYARD. On the 20th of January I introduced a resolution which has been laid over from that time to this, and I now ask its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Committees on Rules of the Senate and House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, instructed to examine, and, after conference, to report whether any, and what, legislation is expedient in regard to the matters considered in the twenty-second joint rule of the last session.

Mr. BAYARD. At the time I offered the resolution I did not understand that it was objected to by any one. The Senator from New York [Mr. Conkling] made some suggestion on the subject, and the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who is not now in his seat, suggested that he might desire to discuss it; but the importance of this question no one denied. We cannot move on this subject too early, nor do I believe more appropriately than in the method we propose. Unless some Senator believes that this matter should be further discussed in the Senate, as this is a mere resolution of instruction to a committee to take up and examine the subject, I would ask its present consideration in the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to inquire of the Senator from

has yet been considered by the House of Representatives

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is aware that for the first time, so far as I can ascertain, in the history of our Government, the Senate elected, without notice to the House, to retire from one of the joint rules. So far as I have been able to give consideration to the subject, it seems to me we have that power. At the same time it never has before to my knowledge been exercised. Now if the subject to which the twenty-second joint rule of the last session related is to be considered, I am very clear that this is the best mode of procuring its considered, I am very clear that this is the best mode of procuring its consideration, and that the conference which will be held by these two committees is much more likely to result in a proper and non-partisan method of dealing with this important subject, than any other way. I sincerely trust that, lifting this matter out of the influence of party, some method satisfactory to the entire country will be reached by which the difficulties surrounding the subject may be overcome. It is in the belief, it is in the hope, that that experiment will be successful that I have felt it my duty to say as much as I have said heretofore on this subject and now again repeat to the Senate.

I have heard of no action of the other House in reference to the late action of the Senate in re-adopting these rules with the exception of the twenty-second joint rule, and I think it important that there should be an adjustment between the two Houses of their co-operative rules which shall be satisfactory to all. There never has been any opposition manifested to that course. The politi-cal complexion of the two Houses—I speak now in a party sense—is cal complexion of the two riouses—I speak now in a party sense—is such as to make it certain that a rule agreed upon by the two Houses will be satisfactory to the entire country; and therefore if the Senator will examine the resolution I think he will see that this is a very proper method of approaching the subject. I propose to do my duty in regard to it, because I thoroughly appreciate the importance of the question. I do not think that it will do to leave the matter where it now rests. I can see difficulties, and very serious difficulties, arising unless some action is taken, and this is a step in the right direction, believing that in this way the matter will be considered in a purely non-partisan manner so as to bring the minds of the two House together in a non-partisan manner, and the sooner it is done the better. We are progressing toward the close of the session; we are coming near the time for the canvass for President and Vice-President; and therefore I think the sooner this question is considered by a committhe of the two Houses the better. I trust there will not be any delay in acting on the resolution. If it is thought to be incomplete and that there is anything omitted which in the mind of any Senator is necessary to a proper consideration of the question, of course I have no objection to amending it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am cordially in favor in the main of the proposition as presented by the Senator from Delaware, and at the proper moment I shall certainly vote for it. I do not wish to diminish the magnitude of the question; I regard it in as serious a light as that Senator possibly can; but it seems to me that the measure would be disencumbered of any embarrassment if the action of the House of Representatives were to precede this request on the part of the Senator from Delaware. I therefore hope that we will wait until the House has taken action, so that there will be left but this one subject to be considered.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator seems to me to imply that the House has power to object to the action of the Senate in regard to the joint rules. If the matter is within the jurisdiction of the Senate to adhere to or retire from a joint rule at their will and pleasure, then it seems to me the action of the House upon that is entirely outside of our consideration; I say outside, beyond that comity and courtesy which, it seems to me, should exist between the two Houses. The Senate without any consultation with the House, for the first time in our legislative history, has broadly re-affirmed and re-adopted the joint rules with the exception of one from which it has elected to retire. As I have stated before, it seems to be incidental to the existence and independence of the Senate that it should have that power, and as this question was embraced by the twenty-second joint of fixed legislation, if legislation can be framed satisfactory to the opinion of both Houses, I think it should now be met and treated in the way I propose. I believe time will be saved, I believe feeling will be saved, I believe a coincidence of opinion reported to each House respectively by this joint committee would go very far toward procuring the assent of each House to the action of the committee. I am very clear in my mind that this subject and the provisions of the Constitution relating to it should be aided by a law of Congress from which neither House could retire at will. The subject should not be left—and I do not think the Senator can fail to agree with me in that-to the mere caprice of either body of Congress at any moment to retire from a rule regulating so important a subject as this. I desire that the method to be adopted shall be found. The difficulty is very apparent. It is because I believe it important to arrive at some such arrangement that I press its consideration now. I think the suggestion I have made is important, and I trust the Senate, unless there be some reason on account of the absence again of some gentleman who desires to say something on this subject, will take up the question now

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It was obvious when this question was up before that there were several Senators who desired to discuss it at length; that it was one involving some amount of difficulty to decide whether the joint rules were operative beyond the term of a Congress or not. It is clear that one House cannot adopt joint rules without the action of the other. I have not been given any information that there is any discrepancy of opinion upon the part of members of either House in relation to the propriety of adopting the joint rules so far as the Senate have already proceeded. Therefore, it seems to me it would be much better that we should have joint rules adopted for every action of the two Houses, and let this matter come up sep-arately and distinctly by itself, where it will be unembarrassed and unencumbered by any other questions. It seems to me clearly that that is the proper course to pursue.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I have certainly inclined to the opinion that there should be some action on this matter by both the House of Representatives and the Senate, and as at present advised I do not now perceive any objection to the course which is suggested by the Senator from Delaware. There is only this reason which occurs to my mind why it is not wise to act upon it now, and that is the fact, as I understand it, that the House has not yet seen fit to consider the proposition which was sent to it by the Senate. It was a new thing for the Senate to act upon the joint rules. Having acted upon them, it is important that we come to an understanding with the House upon that question, as well as upon the question of canvassing the vote for President and Vice-President.

I did not rise to discuss this question at all, but simply to say that the original proposition came from the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] He was absent the other day, out of the city, when it came up. His absence was suggested, and for that reason the resolution went over. I rose for the purpose of suggesting that we would not consider it until that Senator should be present. I was going to remark that he had conferred with me once or twice, from which I inferred that he had something to say upon it, although he did not say so in direct words; but I see the Senator is now present, and the main object for which I rose is now accomplished, to wit, the presence of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is in error, I think, for I drew the resolution myself.

Mr. HAMLIN. I spoke of the original resolution upon the joint rules, which we sent to the House, and the resolution of the Senator from Delaware necessarily followed that. Certainly this resolution was drawn by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. It was proposed as a substitute for the other, but under the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont I withdrew it and did not press it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Precisely; but I infer that the whole thing had its origin in the resolution which was drawn by the Senator from Ver-

Mr. BAYARD. It was because the Senator from Vermont very distinctly, as I remember, intimated his approval of the proposition now before the Senate as an independent measure from that which he had before the Senate as an independent measure from that which he had submitted to the Committee on Rules, or something to that effect, and the objection was made simply at another time. It was thrown over on account of the objection of the Senator from New York, [Mr. Conkling.] Still I merely do what I think is right. The subject is very important, and I think this is the proper way to deal with it. I feel it is tending to bring the matter into an atmosphere certainly favor able to a proper understanding of the subject. With that view only I have offered this resolution. With that view only I now ask its consideration. consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that I have any objection to the present consideration of this resolution. The subject is unquestionably one that ought to be considered; but, after the action we have taken about the joint rules of the last session, it does not appear to me that the Committee on Rules of either House is the proper committee to consider the subject. We omitted this twenty-second rule of the last session from the rules for this session that we passed, as I supposed, upon the universal understanding or judgment that the subject was not a proper one for a matter of rule between the two Houses, but ought to be regulated by law. I had the impression that everybody agreed to that. That being the state of the case, we eliminated anything on the subject of counting the presidential votes from the

Now the subject itself undoubtedly ought to be considered, but the proper committee to consider it is the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as it appears to me. It falls under the head of elections. But it does not appear to me that the Committee on Rules, from its nature, from its organization, from the small number of persons who compose it, is the proper committee to consider a question of that kind; and as a practical matter it might be embarrassing in respect of our getting any joint rules at all at this session, because the other branch, if the Committees on Rules of the two Houses were to go into the consideration of this subject as related to the joint rules, might not act upon our proposition about the joint rules until those might not act upon our proposition about the joint rules until those committees should have reported and we should have agreed on what they had reported. That would leave us without any joint rules, because I think it is evident to a large majority of the Senate that at this moment we have not any joint rules at all; and I give notice (if that is the proper expression to use) that whenever anything which involves the joint rules (except the mere acts of committee between the two Havese which can go on without any mining which involves the joint rules (except the mere acts of communication between the two Houses, which can go on without any rules just as well anyway by mere custom and usage) comes up, I shall make the point that we have not any joint rules, and I shall be merely making a point that the Senate, as I understand, has already decided. If the Senator from Delaware desires to have the subject embraced in his resolution considered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which I believe he is a member—though of that I am not sure. Learning on in favor of it for one am not sure—I certainly am in favor of it for one.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Vermont I think has failed to inspect this resolution. These two committees who heretofore have had the examination of this very subject, that is to say, the subject-matter embraced by the twenty-second joint rule of the last ses-

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand that is so.
Mr. BAYARD. I presume that joint rule was framed by and was the product of the minds of the Joint Committees of the two Houses The rules of the Senate come from the Committee on Rules, on Rules. The rules of the Senate come from the Committee on Rules, and I understand joint rules come from the joint committees.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will pardon me, I think I can correct his misunderstanding. This twenty-second joint rule had its birth on an occasion when a joint resolution of the two Houses was pending before President Lincoln on the subject, I think, of the State of Louisiana; and it was feared, as I understand, that President Lincoln might not approve of that joint resolution, and that the day for counting the votes would come on before it would be known certainly whether he did or not and that a Senator from Illinois Mr. Trumwhether he did or not, and that a Senator from Illinois, Mr. Trumwhether he did or not, and that a Senator from Illinois, Mr. Trumbull, from the Judiciary Committee—whether that committee had it formally referred to them or not I do not know, but acting under the advice of the Judiciary Committee at any rate—proposed this as an additional joint rule in this body, and it was adopted forthwith and went to the House of Representatives and was adopted there.

Mr. BAYARD. The history of that joint rule is interesting, I doubt not, but it is not important as affecting the matter we are now considering. This resolution does not ask to have this question reconsidered and regulated by a joint rule at all, but it does ask whether sidered and regulated by a joint rule at all, but it does ask whether these two committees will not, after conference and examination, re-port any and what legislation is expedient with regard to the matters considered in the twenty-second joint rule of the last session. Therefore the question will simply be, first, whether in the sense of this Senate the subject-matter of counting the electoral votes should be regulated by law, or whether it should continue to be regulated or attempted to be regulated by a joint rule, the existence of which and the operation of which is subject to the caprice and the mere breath of Congress or either House of Congress. I thought it had become a conceded fact in this Chamber now, although it was not for fifteen years, that the question had been improperly dealt with by the twenty-second joint rule, and improperly sought to be regulated by a rule at all; that the proper method of dealing with it was by a law, from which neither House was at liberty to recede without the consent of the other.

Now it is proposed that they should consider what legislation is necessary touching the subject-matter of the twenty-second joint rule. Is there objection to that? I have heard no argument raised against it, although I have seen constant objection and postponement of the proposition. If there be reason against it, we may as well know it, and the country may as well know it, because there are few questions of more importance before us, few questions which call, in my opinion, for the action of Congress more decisively now than this one.

Then the objection may be raised, as has been suggested by the Senator from Vermont, that the Committees on Rules are not appropriate, or from some other cause should not be intrusted with the consideration of the subject. If the Senate thinks some other committees are proper, I have not the least objection to that reference. I do not know the composition; I perhaps ought to know, but I am not aware of who constitute the Committee on Rules of the Senate or who constitute the Committee on Rules of the House; but I believe they have been chosen by the Senate and House with due reference to their fitness, and I have no question that they are competent to deal intelligently and I have no question that they are competent to deal intelligently and properly and in the proper spirit with this grave question. If the Senate has reasons why it does not propose to submit this question to the action of the Joint Committee on Rules, if the Senate considers that it is not a proper method of arriving at a union of the minds of the two Houses on this important subject, that of course will be decided according to its opinion. But now I think that this is the proper way to deal with it and the Senate can express its pleasure on the subject by its vote.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I see no great importance in any question practically before the Senate now, because the whole of the question before the Senate, as I understand it, is whether the object question before the Senate, as I understand it, is whether the object in view will be best promoted by proceeding now to consider this resolution or by allowing it, as was the judgment of the Senate the other day, to wait a little, to the end that all the joint rules except one may be concurred in by the two Houses. That is a very small question. It is a question which relates to the order of business, to the expedient time to do a thing which everybody favors accomplishing. see but one thing of importance connecting itself with this that could be accomplished by anybody, and that I think would be a very pernicious thing. The Constitution makes it the duty of the two Houses of Congress, acting as witnesses or in some other character, to see to the honest counting of electoral votes. I feel sure that there is no Senator acting with the party to which I belong so mad with partisanship, so oblivious to the obligations of his oath, as to wish to do anything except that which will lead to an honest and complete performance at all times of that duty. That Senator, if there be one in this Chamber on either side, who can do it, will do a great disservice and in my opinion a great wrong if he succeeds in convincing anybody within this Chamber or without, either that it is a high test of nonpartisanship to go honestly forward in this regard or that anybody can be found unwilling to go forward or who desires to trip up any suitable measure or endeavor honestly to accomplish this purpose. There is no such thing.

This joint rule has been the subject of solicitude for a long time with those who have thought of it. I have had occasion myself repeatedly, not at this session nor in this year only, but at previous sessions and in previous years, to invite attention to this topic. It was at the commencement of this session the subject of consultation between Senators; and, without further referring to that, I may allude to the circumstance that the Senator from Vermont offered a resolution the specific object of which was to bring up this question. He offered a resolution to inquire whether the joint rules without action on the part of the Senate remained in a body, all of them, including the twenty-second joint rule, the rules of the two Houses. In response to that resolution came a reply which brought up this question; and then on the motion of the Senator from Indiana the twenty-second joint rule was selected and picked out as the one rule not to be adopted and not to continue, but, in the language of some Senator to be struck down, because it was an unsafe rule, and something ought to be put

Now, a resolution is offered proposing to commit this subject to the Committee on Rules of both Houses. I see no objection to that. I have no preference, for one, as to the committees to which this may go, because I assume—I assume despite some intimations somewhat to the contrary—that no Senator can be found on the opposite side of this Chamber (I am very sure he will not be found on this side) inclined to do anything on this subject except that which will result in a strict and honest compliance with the Constitution. Then I say, as I began by saying, that the question is merely one of discretion and convenience. If it is true that having acted upon all the other joint rules and invited the House of Representatives to concur in them, before time enough has elapsed to enable the House to express its opinion on that subject, it will be wise to send a proposition the effect of which may be to unsettle that understanding as far as it has effect of which may be to unsettle that understanding as far as it has gone in reference to the other rules, so be it; I have no objection. My own judgment was the other day—so I stated—it is that economy of time and a regard for accomplishing the purpose, if that be the object, will be promoted by allowing the House to act upon all these rules touching which there is no controversy. When the twenty-second joint rule comes to be the only one dividing the two Houses, then, I repeat, I see no objection to the mode suggested now by the Senator from Delaware. I should see no objection to any other feasible or natural mode of coming to a conclusion and a concurrence between the two Houses on this question; but I hope that we shall between the two Houses on this question; but I hope that we shall not allow this debate to take such a course as to give to the public the idea that we think it is a high act of non-partisanship to do a plain constitutional duty, or that any man must lay aside his partisanship in order to be honest in that regard. I am conscious myself of having no partisanship that I need lay aside for that purpose. I am conscious of being quite willing to day, if it be the judge. myself of having no partisanship that I need lay aside for that purpose. I am conscious of being quite willing to-day, if it be the judgment of the Senate to make this the time, to take the action proposed or any other appropriate action; but I am quite unwilling to be put in the category of objecting or obstructing, because I think we shall make more headway if we go on and agree as far as there is no discord and no objection, and then take up this separate matter and see what we can agree to about it, rather than to take action which may have the effect to even all these internals for discussion and delay have the effect to open all these joint rules for discussion and delay, and hinder an agreement, and postpone the time when this very fit and necessary thing shall be done. I think it had better stand. If we find that the House, after enough time has elapsed, does not mean to act, then we shall be compelled, however glad we might be to have them act on the residue of the rules, to consider the whole subject in them act on the residue of the rules, to consider the whole subject in the best way we can. If, on the contrary, as we are bound to sup-pose, the House shall act and shall agree to the residue of these rules, then we shall have one single thing before us; and, when we come to treat of that thing, if it shall be found that Senators divide accord-ing to the party to which they belong, I shall be ready to confess my 'great astonishment. It seems to me that if you could select a question which does not appeal to party, which appeals to nothing but the judgment and the conscience of Senators, the very question is now

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not know what thought was passing in the mind of the honorable Senator from New York when I was addressing the Senate on this subject; but I think that more than his genius will be required to discover the least reference to the possibility of partisan feeling in this Chamber on this subject. There was nothing which I said, there was no word I used, there was neither look nor expression I am sure that could give rise to any such suggestion, or make as I consider any such reference at all necessary in regard to anything that I said. I simply declared that which was a plain fact, that when the committees of the two Houses, composed as the two Houses of Congress now are as to political sentiment, as the two Houses of Congress now are as to political sentiment, should come together and present a measure which met with their joint approval it would go far toward banishing anything like the possibility of a partisan advantage or feeling in regard to so broad and important a matter as this. It was because I desired it should be so, not only for the sake of the action of the Senate and of the House, but for the sake of the feeling of our fellow-countrymen throughout this broad land, that I believed anything done should be concurred. out this broad land, that I believed anything done should be concurred out this broad land, that I believed anything done should be concurred in by committees representing the varied sentiment not in this Chamber alone, but in the two Houses. That being once established to the satisfaction of the people of the country, they would be satisfied that there could be no possible party advantage obtained in the conference or consultation of the two Houses of Congress, the dominant party in each being different.

So far as the Senate is concerned there has not been an allusion, and no language of mine capable of having an allusion, drawn or tortured, or to justify the suggestion that I ascribed partisanship to action on an abstract question of public duty on the part of any Senator on either side of the Chamber. I merely spoke of the known difference of opinion politically between the two Houses of Congress, and my belief that a law which would be satisfactory to committees representing the variant parties would be satisfactory to our fellowcountrymen; and that it was important that there should be acquiescence in the justice of a rule or a law touching so broad and funda-

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, as I always mean to be frank, I will be so now. Meaning no offense to the Senator from Delaware, I did refer to him, and to him alone, as the member of this body who, as I understand, made repeated reference to this subject as if there was danger of partisanship entering into it. I have heard the Senator avow and reiterate that all partisanship ought to be abandoned in this regard, that it should be kept out of the domain of partisanship. I have heard him say that several times to-day and on other days; and I listened with more surprise to-day to this suggestion which fell from him—I may not be able to quote his words exactly that if there were hose there who wished to impede or obstruct, (perhaps he used neither word, but an equivalent term,) it had better be known by the Senate and by the country. I think I am not mistaken in supposing that the Senator said that.

Now I submit to that honorable Senator and to the other members of this body, that, considering the nature of this question, and considering the utter absence, as he himself avows, of partisan manifestation in regard to it, it is hardly worth while for either of us to attempt or unconsciously by inadvertence to create the impression beyond this Chamber that anybody here is seeking a partisan advantage here over anybody else upon the naked question whether a true count of the votes should be made. Whenever this body or any of its members falls so low that an honest office of counting, a duty so plain as that imposed upon us by the Constitution, cannot be discharged because we are so mad-party-wise, it will be a sorry day in-deed and a sorry illustration of the total failure of our institutions

If the Senator from Delware did not intend to carry that idea, I certainly do not wish to impute it to him; but I have thought from his repeated references to this that there might slumber in his mind a fear that somebody somewhere in the Senate was going to refuse to do that which ought to be done because he was driven by the stress of party in regard to it. It was to disabuse the mind of anybody who might be so affected, if I could, that I referred to this subject, and if the Senator from Delaware did not mean to give the impression which

I received from his remark, then I misunderstood him.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from New York can scarcely require me to continue this matter, because the RECORD must disclose what I have said. I intended in what I said last to the Senate simply to refer to what I had said on this subject before, and to repeat that I did not believe even the ingenuity of the Senator from New York or any one else could discover in anything I had said the suggestion that there was a partisan spirit in this Chamber on this subject. That is what I meant to say, and I think I succeeded in saying it.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, if I understand the proposition, it is to refer this question to the Committee on Rules of the two Houses.

It is discussed here as if it was a new question. It is not so by any I remember the debate last session on a bill for the purpose of repealing the twenty-second joint rule and establishing a law to provide for counting the electoral votes, taking away from one House the power to disfranchise a State, and providing that no electoral vote should be rejected except by the concurrent action of both Houses. I thought the bill was eminently fair and that no valid objection was made to it. I remember that my friend from Delaware voted against it and spoke against it for a long time, but that the bill finally passed. It was impossible that it should be in favor of one party or the other. It was simply to provide a safe rule for counting the electoral votes, abolishing the twenty-second joint rule, and providing that both Houses of Congress must concur to reject a single vote from any State —the only safe rule that we can adopt—and providing also for a limited debate so that a vote should not be rejected without consideration. It was voted against by a number of Senators on this floor, but the bill passed this body and failed to pass the House of Representa-tives. Now that same bill is pending again, and I see no reason for undertaking to transfer the matter to the consideration of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BAYARD. Is there such a bill upon the files of the Senate? Mr. MORTON. There is. I introduced it, and it is now before the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BAYARD. Then it is not before the Senate. It is in commit-

Mr. MORTON. It will be before the Senate, I doubt not, before a great while. Whatever is done, in my opinion, ought to be done in the form of a law. The idea of the two Houses by a simple rule rejecting the vote of a State is preposterous.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the resolution called up by the Senator from Delaware.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senute, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Committees on Rules of the Senate and House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, instructed to examine, and, after conference, to report whether any, and what, legislation is expedient in regard to the matters considered in the twenty-second joint rule of the last session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend by striking out that part of the resolution which makes it a concurrent resolution and refers the mat-ter to the Committee on Rules, and inserting the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body, which will take it to the tribunal that now has the subject under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the solution as amended.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that the resolution be read as it stands now. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be, and they are hereby, instructed to examine and report whether any and what legislation is expedient in regard to the matters considered in the twenty-second joint rule of the

Mr. BAYARD. It will be observed that this was meant to be a joint resolution. It was so framed. It is so still, even as the Clerk has read it, because the amendment striking out the Committee on Rules and inserting the Committee on Privileges and Elections has not gone far enough.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My motion was to strike out all that part making it a concurrent resolution, and all the part referring to the other House, and to make it simply an order to the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood, and the Senate has agreed to that amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. Now, I simply desire to submit to the Senate whether it is not reasonably proper to suppose that upon private conference of the committees of the two Houses a measure is more apt to be generated which will receive the approval of both Houses on this subject. It was because I believed it was better for neither House to act upon the measure in priority of the other, but that when the measure came it should come, as it were, simultaneously into both Houses, it being understood that the committee had conferred and had agreed that this was a proper measure upon this important subject. It is my belief that the two Houses ought to agree. It will be to me a source of very great regret, anxiety, and concern if the Houses fail to agree, and believing that the best chance to produce concurrence between these two Houses of Congress, relatively under concurrence between these two Houses of Congress, relatively under the influence of different partisan feelings, is by a quiet conference between the two committees, I submit that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont ought not to prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator that the Senate has agreed to the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. Then the resolution must be further amended than he has gone, because the amendment, as I understood it, was simply to substitute the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate and the like committee in the House instead of the two Commit-ate and the like committee in the House instead of the two Committees on Rules; and the resolution, so far as I heard the amendment read, leaves it still in its frame a joint resolution of the two Houses It is very plain to me—I cannot forsake my judgment on that subject-that our chance of producing concurrent action on this subject between the two Houses, organized as they are at present, is much better when we shall have a rule presented by the two committees, each reflecting the political sentiments of the relative body it represents, which would be very apt to produce a concurrence of sentiment between both bodies. My object is that which I avow.

Mr. CLAŸTON. I ask that the resolution be read again. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution as it stands amended.

Mr. THURMAN. I rise merely to say that as I understood the mo-tion of the Senator from Vermont to be submitted to the Senate and voted upon, it was simply to substitute the Committees on Privileges and Elections for the Committees on Rules, leaving the resolution a concurrent resolution as first introduced. If it has any wider scope than that, it certainly was misunderstood by me, and I think by others. I do not think it was voted upon with the understanding that it was to strike out the concurrent part of the resolution and make it simply a reference of the question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was certainly my motion; but we can test the sense of the Senate on that by moving to reconsider the vote, and, if we choose to reconsider the vote, then it will stand as a concurrent resolution.

Mr. THURMAN.

I did not vote on the motion at all. Well, in order to test the sense of the Senate, as Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, in order to test the sense of the Senate, as it is said it was misunderstood, I move to reconsider the vote adopting my amendment. I shall of course vote against the reconsideration; but this will give gentlemen who did not understand it an opportunity to see what the amendment of the Senate is.

Mr. SARGENT. Let it be reported again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution as it will read when amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be, and they are here-by, instructed to examine and report whether any, and what, legislation is expedient in regard to the matters considered in the twenty-second joint rule of the last ses-

Mr. BAYARD. I certainly understood, as the Senator from Ohio did, that the only amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont was the substitution of one named committee for another, without altering the frame of the resolution in any other respect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reconsidera-

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know, Mr. President, that practically it makes much difference in what form the legislation that everybody seems to consider necessary shall be inaugurated. It certainly has been urged upon the Senate very strongly, it was so urged at previous sessions, that something must be done; and we remember with what carnestness and zeal the Senator from Indiana pressed a bill which he introduced from the Compilton Provided From the Compilto introduced from the Committee on Privileges and Elections to regulate the count of the votes for President and Vice-President, and how he told us that a civil war might break out by reason of the imperne told us that a civil war might break out by reason of the imperfection of the twenty-second joint rule and the want of some proper legislation upon that subject. I think, too, that the general sense of the Senate was that anything we did provide should be by law, and not by a rule of the two Houses; and certainly, since a majority of the Senate have taken the ground that a joint rule is a thing that subsists only during the good pleasure of the respective Houses and that either House may retire from it, that either House may withdraw its assent from the rule and let it fall the precessity of anything whatever either House may retire from it, that either House may withdraw its assent from the rule and let it fall, the necessity of putting whatever we do in the shape of law is more apparent than it ever was before. Then if there be necessity for this legislation—and that does not seem to be denied—the Senate has shown that such is its opinion by the passage of the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana from the Committee on Privileges and Elections—that mode which will most speedily and certainly secure action on the subject is the best mode. Looked at in the point of view, I are after the production of the subject is the best mode. Looked at in that point of view, I am of the impression that if the committees of the two Houses were to sit upon such a bill and concur in it and report it to each House, it would more likely pass than if a bill was framed in one House and sent to the other.

I do not think I shall ever vote for a joint committee of investigation as long as I live; but a joint committee to consider a subject and report legislation is not obnoxious to the objections that exist against joint committees of investigation. I think it might facilitate an understanding between the two Houses as to what ought to be done if we referred this matter to a committee of the Senate and the House.

I am therefore inclined to favor the proposition of the Senator from Delaware to make this a concurrent resolution and have the reference to the two committees to consider it together. For that reason I hope the vote will be reconsidered and the concurrent character of the resolution retained. I have no objection for my own part to the substitution of the Committees on Privileges and Elections for the Committees on Rules. That, I think, is better.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask for the regular order. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the unfinished business is the bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence. That bill is before

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I know that the Senate is weary of debate, and that no words of mine will add a vote in favor of the bill, as I trust no expressions I shall utter will take a vote from it.

I was charmed yesterday with the eloquence of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Norwood.] I listened to him with great attention, and, as I ever do, with respect, but failed to become convinced by his arguments. As a dissection of the Constitution I admit that no more careful argument can be prepared. If we want to know no more careful argument can be prepared. If we want to know how capital letters should be placed, how colons and semicolons, how periods and exclamation points should be arranged in the print of the Constitution, and how they bore upon its interpretation, I am sure we were fully informed yesterday by my distinguished friend from Georgia. I am not sure that it is so, but it seemed to me as he closed that part of his argument I had been made to understand what a constitutional comma was. There was a reference made by the Senator from Georgia, without due reflection, I must believe, that did great injustice, not only to a class of men I have known long and well, and who stand without superiors in all this country as men of honor, integrity, and fidelity—I refer to the men who now control the boards of the centennial exposition—a reference was made by the Senator that I am sure he did not intend as a reflection upon them, and I am equally sure that he could not have intended it as a reflection upon any member of this body. It was as to the lobby influence that had pressed the passage of this bill. If, sir, such lobby has had an existence the Senator is possessed of knowledge I am not.

Not a human being has ever asked me to vote for or against this bill. Even the people of my own State, largely favorable to the exposition, have never sought to embarrass my perfect freedom of speech

Mr. NORWOOD. I do not know, sir, to what reference in the remarks that I made yesterday my honorable friend from New Jersey alludes. I remember making one allusion in which the word "lobby" was used, but only one, and I am sure that that expression did not apply either to the centennial board or to any member of this branch of Congress or the other branch. It was a general reference as to what in my judgment would be the effect upon the future legislation of this country if we were to set precedents like that which I think legislation of this character would set. I meant simply that, and nothing more. Nothing was further from my intention than to make any reflection upon any gentlemen outside of or inside of Congress, in its application to this bill. The expression that I refer to that I made was when I spoke of what this legislation would teach future genera-tions; and I said that it would teach them not to rely upon them-selves, but to rely upon the General Government for support, and it would change the form of our Government and destroy the spirit of the American citizen as it has been exhibited heretofore; and in that the American citizen as it has been exhibited heretofore; and in that connection I said that it would follow probably that we would teach genius that the high road to fame and fortune did not lie through labor and want and privation and toil, as hitherto, but that it would lie through the power of the lobby to the Halls of Congress. My remark was general and had no application to the centennial board or to the members of the Senate or House. If any other expression fell from my lips than the one to which I have reference. I do not remember. from my lips than the one to which I have reference, I do not remember it. I certainly did not intend to make any such reference, and if I did, I will with the greatest pleasure withdraw it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, it was because I had the full assurance in my heart that the Senator from Georgia was incapable of making so unjust a reference as that which he has taken occasion to explain, that I have made this reference to his remarks of last evenof the exposition; they need none at my hands. My allusion is made principally that the Senator might have that opportunity I would ask him to give me, like misinterpreted—one that I knew he would promptly avail himself of, to make his record right, his real meaning incapable of misinterpretation.

Mr. President, my honorable friend the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCreery] who delivered a speech in this body upon a recent occasion remarkable for its eloquence, for the beauty of its language, and I wish I could say for the logic that usually enforces his utter-ances—my friend the Senator introduced, as amendatory of the bill now before the Senate, some such provision as this: Striking out all after the enacting clause he proposed to recommend that on a given day in July the people of the States should join in universal prayer. I am as firm a believer, sir, in the efficacy of prayer as any man in all this land. I have been brought up to believe that all power comes from Almighty God; that he gives to those who ask in faith. I regret I was compelled under the circumstances to vote against so pure, so peaceful, and so pious a proposition.

But, sir, I have always been taught to believe that, effective as prayer is, there is another Christian duty and that lies in good works. When the Senator from Kentucky was making his most admirable speech, I could not help but think of that line which somewhere I have seen, that—

Prayer is the food which men bestow for alms.

The Senator will observe, therefore, that, pious as his proposition was, it was not original.

The Centennial Commission have come asking an appropriation for what they deemed to be a commendable object, and my friend from Kentucky offers them prayer. His knowledge of biblical history, no doubt, far outruns mine, but I do not recollect to have read that ever

The Senator from Kentucky proposed in place of the centennial exhibition to have a day of universal prayer. In its stead he would have praise, without a jubilant note; thanksgiving, without the feast; gratitude, without a cent of cost. Is that the way, sir, the American people are to show their appreciation of what "God hath wrought?"

His command has ever been to erect temples in which to worship

Him—monuments to indicate the growth and gratitude of the peoples

I leave this branch of the subject, Mr. President, with this single remark, with the purpose of recalling to the mind of my distinguished friend from Kentucky that "prayer is the soul's sincere desire," and that he who would have it effective, must not have much faith in it as a legislative "rider."

I pass, sir, to the consideration of the main question. There is no controversy as to the propriety of the contemplated celebration. The time is fitting; the place appropriate; the welcome is all that can be asked. The right or the expediency of the celebration alone is questioned. How can we, it is asked by prudent men, careful of our following productions of parity to expend the result that the result to expend the result the result that the resul questioned. How can we, it is asked by prudent men, careful of our fellow-needs, in a time of national distress—of peril to general credit—give the money of the people toward a centennial celebration—a celebration which it has been claimed by my friend from Georgia as a mere private enterprise, by the Senator from Virginia as a stock operation; how can we give of our meager funds to such an enterprise?

Mr. President, the fact is that a large proportion of the expendit

Mr. President, the fact is that a large proportion of the expenditure consequent upon the exposition took place prior to the hard times. Either by contracts made or by moneys paid out, the larger outlay involved had taken place prior to any application for con-

But aside from this fact there is, in my opinion, a better answer That in the judgment of acute commercial men every dollar that is contributed by Congress for the purpose proposed will be more than returned by the moneys which will flow into this country from other lands because, and only because, of this exposition. The incidental pecuniary advantages arising from the exhibition are those that have been often repeated, the new impulse given to commercial life, turning the now sluggish wheels of trade, and putting into life and mo-

Human nature covets that which it sees and likes. I do not think my friend from Kentucky will differ with me as to this proposition. It may be very wicked, and I suspect sometimes it is, but it is always true; and so from this exhibition a thousand new wants will arise; a thousand new and almost unthought-of demands will be produced and the aggregate of these will alone, in their supply, start the dull pulse of commerce with new and healthful throb. Mr. President, this view of the subject may seem an inferior one to suggest, but to the starving artisan, to the willing tens of thousands of half-fed men and women in the land, it has more of interest just now, singular as this may seem, than the most labored and learned of technical disquisitions.

We have of money in abundance. Was it ever more plentiful in financial centers? The rich are weary of hoarding and are luxuriously miserable in the knowledge of their loss of interest.

The poor need it, alas, how largely and how sadly!

It is no exaggeration to say that the impetus given to trade and

It is no exaggeration to say that the impetus given to trade and commerce by the exposition will, in the judgment of our best commercial men, our reflecting, thoughtful men, men who wield millions of trade themselves each year, be worth more to the people of this country in general return, through absolute gain, than all the moneys that will be expended by authority of the Congress of the United States. The gathered multitudes, the vast agricultural, mechanical, and artistic display, the attrition of forces, will do more to germinate the single element needed—public confidence—than any other movement Congress can now give aid to.

It has seemed to me, sir, that nationally and commercially we were as a ponderous engine with its great driving-wheel upon the "center;" that there was power enough behind it and to spare; that the very retention of the power was, in conservative minds, one of the great and impending dangers of the country. Because this power is not called into requisition, because the great wheel stands motionless, we lack prosperity. The turn of a finger's breadth, and throbbing, heltahful life will run into countless pulses. If for no other reason than the firm belief that the Centennial exposition will give the imheltahful life will run into countless pulses. If for no other reason than the firm belief that the Centennial exposition will give the impulse to trade and commerce which is wanting I should vote for this bill, and will no more question the constitutionality of that vote than I would stop to ask my friend the Senator from Connecticut for instance, to repeat to me the Longer or the Shorter Catechism (and I hope he knows them both) before I helped to save his imperiled life. I will not tediously recapitulate other reasons, many of which come to my mind, in favor of the passage of this bill. A word, however, as to its political effect. Every word of reconciliation that may be spoken during the months of that great exposition seems to me to be so many seeds of promise for the future; and assuredly as the Great Master taught "blessed are the peacemakers," so every word, so every act of ours that leads the way to true reconciliation, will be blessed of Heaven. The great heart of the people turns toward peace. They are weary of strife. They do know that men gather not grapes of are weary of strife. They do know that men gather not grapes of thorns nor figs of thistles. If no other gain were had than the reconciliation which is promised, the reconciliation which we are told by members of all parties in Congress is almost sure to follow, if no other gain was had than this, I should vote for this bill and feel my-Self amply justified.

I recollect, sir, that upon a recent occasion I heard my friend the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Maxey,] who had stood in the front of the battle and who had raised his own arm against this Government, I recollect the appeal that he made to the Senate in behalf of the exposition because it was one of the best modes of bringing about a real peace, of re-establishing a perfect union of the States. I believe that peace and reconciliation are best had through better knowledge of each other, through social and familiar intercourse, through those interests, sympathies, and affections that personal knowledge can alone give to mankind as to each other.

Mr. President, a thousand tongues have sounded the praise of Penn-Mr. President, a thousand tongues have sounded the praise of Pennsylvania, and a thousand more, I doubt not, of the city of Philadelphia, because of their liberality, because of their generosity, because of their munificence in the matter of the celebration. There has been no word spoken in behalf of that grand old State that lies neighbor to mine, one of the old thirteen; there is no word which has been said commendatory of the State, of her people, of her great city, of her munificence, that I do not indorse. But they need no words of commendation from me; they ask no praise from me; they seek no compliment from the Senate. They stand to-day peerless, among American authorities, in their munificence, their waiting hospitality. It has been said, Mr. President, that there were those who hoped to find some gain because of this exposition. I think my friend from Kentucky intimated that it might prove profitable to some people.

Kentucky intimated that it might prove profitable to some people. Kentucky intimated that it might prove profitable to some people. Well, sir, it is possible that there be those who have contributed toward this exhibition who have found their profit and their patriotism in very amiable companionship. It is possible, I say, that this has happened; but I recollect long, long years ago—of course before any of the present members of this Congress had membership here—that gentlemen connected with one or the other Houses of Congress found their profit and patriotism in close fellowship. Is that any reason why the Congress of these States should be dissolved? God forbid, I hear on every side, and loudest and longest perhaps from those gentlemen who situated as I am, have a long term before them. gentlemen who situated as I am, have a long term before them.

No, Mr. President, because bad men or mean men have found it to whole affair should be charged with being a mere money-making concern. It is not true. I prefer to believe that the inspiration came from nobler and higher and better motives, and that those who have lived for long years under the shadow of Independence Hall give to us an honest welcome, and that in their invitation they mean what they say. From them these hearty words come: "Join us in commemorating the glories of our country in the past; join us in giving a full welcome to the waiting century."

There is another view I desire to take of this subject. I look upon the celebration as a duty. Not only is it a mile-stone that marks the national progress, but it is a monumental stone that fixes the line between the experimental republicanism of the past and the established and fixed Union of these States. It is a duty to proclaim to millions of men in other lands that free institutions, with personal, civil, and religious liberty are no longer political problems but established facts. It is because this proclamation is to go to millions of men who look with anxious hearts toward the result of a republican experiment that I believe our national duty, if I may use the word "national"— and not offend the Senator from Connecticut—

Mr. EATON. You are free to use any word you please.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am very much obliged for the liberty that my friend from Connecticut gives me. The word "national" seems to be an offensive word to him, and it would be to me, I have no doubt, if it had that broad interpretation in my mind that he imagines it has in some others. I am not so learned in the use of words as he perhaps, nor am I so learned in the technical meaning of them, perchance, as some who have made constitutional law their peculiar study. We Jersey people are a plain people, given up largely to plain pursuits, and do not get the time that our Connecticut friends obtain to dissect questions of constitutional law.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to show thus far that the exposition is commendable in its character and expedient to have; that it is more likely to conduce to prosperity than to bring about additional adversity; and that the expenditure of the public moneys may prove, and in the judgment of sincere and honest men will prove directly and indirectly, most remunerative to those to whom the public money

Consulting my own tastes, I would have preferred the omission of this purely material view of the subject. I know, however, that the people are burdened with debt, are jealous of the exercise of doubtful power, and look forward with great anxiety to our return to a simple, honest, and economical form of government. In all these feelings and desires they have my hearty sympathy. If I believed that my vote to-day would aid to expend a dollar not quickly returning to them full, complete, and ample payment, despite my belief in the constitutionality of the act, I would not vote for the appropriation. It is because of these practical results most likely to occur that I am enabled to-day to give what I deem not only a constitutional vote, but a hearty co-operation to the measure. but a hearty co-operation to the measure.

I am in full accord, sir, with every member of this body who would resist the passage of any appropriation that has not the clear sanction of constitutional law. No pecuniary advantage to the people, no sentiment of patriotism, no probable bond of fellowship even, would induce me to transgress the plain purpose of those who framed the fundamental law. I profess to have as much conscience upon this subject and to be as anxious to preserve the Constitution of the United States from violation as the most rigid constructionists. I do not impugn their sincerity; I do not propose they shall mine, unchallenged. I regret the tone of debate coming from Senators differing with those

I have been accustomed to consider these States—and I am not going to give their history, I beg to say, just now—as in their original condition under the old confederation, as so many pieces of timber in a raft, bound together by withes, stronger or weaker, of more or less value, loosely held, and of equal strength, as my friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] suggests. I do not know whether he was in the original convention or not, and I am not always sure I was not, for I by the first rough sea as lacking in coherence, and driven by their singleness to constant peril. The great raft was known to be most valuable; it had cost years of toil to gather, thousands of lives to preserve. Yet the confederacy proved but a raft when they who manned it, menaced no longer by a common danger, gave in part to other and necessary labor their attention.

Because of manifest weakness, by common agreement, the separate pieces were builded into one; and so, using a common metaphor, these States were united as parts of one great ship of state.

Whatever conduces to its preservation is our common duty to perform. If the strength of its frame is to be supplemented, we hew new States from old Territories. If weakness is found in ribs or keelson we strengthen by constitutional amendments, or think wedo. May we not also give the old ship a good preserving coat of paint once in a century? Will it not help preserve its beaten sides and tighten the ever-occurring seams?

Pardon me, Mr. President. I know that metaphors are light missiles when weed, exist constitutional chiestions.

when urged against constitutional objections.

Sir, it is admitted on almost every side that the Federal Government can erect such buildings as it may deem proper; provided the land upon which these buildings are erected shall be ceded to or originally owned by it. It is not denied, therefore, that if five or ten acres of the Philadelphia park were now held in fee by the Government, then its power to appropriate the money, and for this precise purpose, would be unquestioned.

Mr. SAULSBURY. For what purpose?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator asks me for what purpose. I say for any purpose within the limits of the Constitution; and the Constitution seems by the Senator's predecessors to have been construed that public buildings can be erected far in excess of any uses of the government or necessities of the case. I do not know how extravagant the public buildings are in Delaware, but I do know that in my own State, and throughout all the States, there are public buildings being erected to-day costing ten times as much as any necessity of the Federal Government. When you have broken the barrier no human being can decide for another where the constitutional line is.

Just as the Government has built light-houses from Maine to Texas; custom and court-houses, and costly ones too, in every State; the Capitol and public buildings here; because it deemed them not necessary alone, (for much simpler and inexpensive ones would have done as well,) but as buildings fitted to the dignity and power of a great government as well as to its needs.

The most rigid constructionist found no difficulty in voting for extravagant custom-houses at New York, New Orleans, Richmond, New Haven, and elsewhere. They were built on bits of property nominally owned by the Federal Government, actually held as completely in the possession of the communities wherein situated as the irremovable ground on which they were built. Did not the events of the late war prove this? Of what real value was the title deed of the land on which the New Orleans or Richmond custom-house was built, till Federal troops possessed it. Fee though we owned and yearn as we did, events proved that neither groans nor title availed against possession.

Federal property in the States is valuable only so long as Federal power can obtain and keep it; and just so long as this can be done all property, public and private, within the State is equally within the grasp or power of the Federal Government.

I know my legal friends may deem this a broad doctrine, and I also believe that there is no warrant for it in constitutional law; but the fact stands, that whenever the Federal exigency or "necessity" has arisen its claim has been generally acceded to, and will to the end. I do not indorse the exercise of the power; I simply state the fact.

Thus, Mr. President, I have endeavored to show that those who contend against the power of Congress to furnish means to erect public buildings on State or other property, and admit the right of appro-priation for constructions on the same when cession of it has been made by the State, make an objection so destitute of practical force and so technical in character as to make those less acquainted than I am with them doubt their sincerity. This injustice I cannot and will not do them. For my own part, I have no more doubt of the right of Congress to celebrate the centennial year of the nation than I have of its right to fly a flag over this Capitol. That is but a piece of bunting. If the centennial celebration prove no more than mere display, still no violation of the Constitution would occur, however our co-operation might make questionable our economy or impeach our wisdom.

I gladly acknowledge, Mr. President, that all my sympathies have been with the proposed celebration from its inception. For reasons I have given and for others unnamed, I have desired its complete success. I cannot forget that in part I represent a State whose soil was fattened by the blood of her revolutionary heroes; that hers, during the long years of revolutionary war, was the bloody ground, the confessed battle-field of the Revolution.

To Jerseymen, as to you, sir, the names of Trenton, of Princeton, of Morris, of Springfield, and of Monmouth are electric words.

The hills of my State held the Continental Army during two of the most terrible winters of the war. The valleys gave of their meager supply to save the half-famished troops of Virginia, Maryland, and of Connecticut. My home is on consecrated ground—made so by men I have seen and known—who tracked the snow with their bleeding feet treading their weary rounds, knowing that they whom they guarded from danger were all that stood 'twixt Britain's tyranny and America's liberty.

It would be strange, indeed, if with these memories and associatious I did not look with peculiar favor upon any circumstance that would revive grateful recollections of my State and people, that would renew revive grateful recollections of my State and people, that would renew the memory of events never too often recalled, upon which, as upon a trembling balance, hung the fate of American freedom, of civil and religious liberty.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, the opposition to the bill before the Senate has been put by nearly every speaker who has opposed it upon constitutional grounds. Very few that I am aware of have objected to this measure on the ground of policy wiedom or have objected to this measure on the ground of policy, wisdom, or expediency. We are asked to point out the power in the Constituexpediency. We are asked to point out the power in the Constitu-tion which justifies this appropriation. There is nothing more diffi-cult to do than to strain language in order to carry explicitness be-yond the point that plain words can go. Chief Justice Marshall very often felt the force of this truth, and he has said that he was never more embarrassed than when he attempted to explain those powers and those provisions of the Constitution which were obvious from an inspection of the instrument. It was in something like this spirit that Dr. Johnson replied, I think, to Dr. Berkeley when the latter asked him to refute the argument which accounted for the non-existasked nim to refute the argument which accounted for the non-existence of matter. The learned philosopher simply stamped his foot upon the earth and exclaimed, "I refute it thus."

When gentlemen ask where the power resides for this Government to commemorate its own blood-stained birth, I tell them that if it cannot be found in the Constitution, (which I think it can,) it is because it has existed before the Constitution, and that it was unnecessary to specify a power which was inseparable from the exist-ence of the United States as an independent power from the first day of its existence. We are told by able writers that government is created its existence. We are told by able writers that government is created to protect society, and society for the protection of individuals. Whatever the form of government, the interests and passions of men render some kind a necessity, and no matter where we turn we find men living in a state of subjection to some description of law. It would be difficult to fix a time when the people of America were not united in some form of alliance together. Before the Revolution, there is the advice were cettled and conversed wavelendighted the solution. though the colonies were settled and governed under distinct char-ters, they were regarded as part of the same empire, and in matters of a purely external character were bound by the same laws. Yet, while in that state, they not unfrequently acted together in matters affecting their common interests without any authority from the Crown. They were accustomed from a very early period, and at a time when no one claimed for them sovereign rights, but while yet dependent colonies of the British power, to associate together in order to advance their industrial and commercial intents and provide for their common defense and general welfare. And it may be said that the arbitrary attack by the mother-country upon the charter rights in 1754, in consequence of the exercise of those inalienable rights of defense and association which they claimed even as dependent colonies, laid the foundation of that jealous spirit of liberty which finally culminated in their permanent separation from the British Crown.

One would suppose, sir, from the arguments which we have heard, that the people of this country had never been accustomed to exercise any rights or privileges for which authority could not be found in some moth-eaten charter or dusty Parliament roll. The general wel-fare clause, about which so much has been said, was known to the people of the United States before it found its way into the present Constitution. It formed a distinct substantive grant of power in the Articles of Confederation, and no one can claim that it had any such connection with the other specific powers in those articles which is claimed to exist between it and the delegated powers contained in the present Constitution.

Article 8 of the Articles of Confederation reads as follows:

All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the

This grant of power does not stand at the head of all the others, and it cannot be said to mean any more than a simple indefinite authority to expend the money of the Government in the execution of the powers that follow. It is well known that the difficulty under the Articles of Confederation respecting the power of taxation arose out of the failure or refusal of the States to comply with the just and legal requisitions of the General Government upon them and the absence of any power in the latter to enforce its demands except by physical force or by persuasion. The Government was a league created, not by the people, but by the States in their corporate character. and, while the Congress had full authority to demand any sum of money which they deemed necessary to meet expenses incurred for the general welfare, and the States were bound to furnish it, there existed no remedy but persuasion for its collection, and this, as we know,

If the government of the confederation had authority under the article which I have cited to demand money from the States to pay expenses incurred for what Congress considered the general welfare, how can it be claimed that the same clause or language when transposed into the present Constitution—which is confessedly an instrument of larger and broader powers-will not warrant the same demands upon the people that were formerly authorized to be made upon the States? All expenses incurred for the general welfare and allowed by Congress were chargeable upon the common treasury of the confederation. The present Constitution empowers Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United

Can you give to the language of the Constitution less force or effect than was authorized by that of the articles of confederation? Can the said with the least show of reason that the words "to provide for the general welfare" mean nothing; that the powers of Congress would be as full and ample without them, by reason of the other specific powers which follow, when the very same language, employed in connection with other powers, has been held to be pregnant with

Congress is to provide for calling forth the militia, to provide and maintain a navy, to provide for arming the militia. And each of these powers, according to a certain class of opinions, constitute disthese powers, according to a certain class of opinions, constitute distinct grants of authority to do the precise things mentioned, while "to provide for the general welfare" means no more than to attend to the public interests by exercising all the delegated trusts except this. Now, sir, the language "to provide for the general welfare," by the exercise of the revenue power, is just as definite, as clear, and pointed as the words "to provide and maintain a navy" or to provide for arming and organizing the militia.

Mr. Curtis, in his history of the Constitution, informs us that the revenue clause, as reported from the committee on detail, and as adopted unanimously by the convention on the 16th of August, gave Congress power to lay and collect taxes, duties, and excises, with a restriction only as to the taxation of exports, and that it did not designate any of the objects to which the revenue should be applied. At ignate any of the objects to which the revenue should be applied. At a subsequent period the words "to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare" were added, and there is no part of the Constitution that throws more light upon the trials and difficulties connected with the adoption of our present form of government than the history of that clause, and nothing which I have heard has presented the true history of the adoption of that clause. Mr. Rutledge, from South Carolina, moved for a grand committee to consider the expediency of assuming the debts of the several States by the United States, which was granted, and it appears that the object of the reference was the propriety of inserting a specific power in the Constitution to authorize special appropriations for the payment of the debts of the United States and of the several States, and not to make a declaration of the purposes for which revenue should be raised. The grand committee reported the following provision:

The legislature of the United States shall have power to fulfill the engagements entered into by Congress, and to discharge as well the debts of the United States as the debts incurred by the several States during the late war for common defense and general welfare.

The committee on detail, on the following day, recommended that at the end of the clause already adopted, which gave Congress unlimited power of taxation, &c., the following words should be added:

For the payment of the debts and necessary expenses of the United States: Provided, That no law for raising any branch of revenue, except what may be specially appropriated for the payment of interest on debts and loans, shall continue in force for more than a term of years.

Two separate propositions, Mr. President, it appears were thus submitted to the convention. One to give Congress the power to pay the revolutionary debt, including those of the States; the other to declare that revenue and taxes were to be raised for the purpose of paying the debts and necessary expenses of the United States.

When the convention came to consider these propositions the report of the grand committee was modified, and instead of adopting the language of the report, the convention substituted that now found in the first clause of the sixth article of the Constitution, which declares

All debts contracted and engagements entered into before the adoption of this Constitution shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution as under the Confederation.

The State debts were omitted from this article, but they were provided for by an amendment to the revenue clause, by the addition of the words to that clause as they are now found in the Constitution, as follows:

To pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

I say, sir, and I say with great confidence, that these words were never intended as a limitation on the revenue power; that they were put into the Constitution not to restrain the authority of the Government in raising revenue, but to enlarge it even beyond the spirit of the very general power previously agreed to by the convention. We know, sir, that there was no subject which engaged more serious attention after the Revolution than the question of the assumption of the debts of the States by the General Government. It was discussed and considered in the convention at Philadelphia, and it agitated, as we know, very greatly the councils of the new Government at New York. Mr. Jefferson has left it upon record that the disputes and dissensions which it occasioned gave rise to the first threat of secession ever heard in the United States, and that the location of the Capitol in this District was the result of a compromise entered into between the friends and the enemies of that measure. It is not just, in my opinion, therefore, to attempt to limit the power of this Government over taxation and revenue by the words which were added to the revenue clause for the purpose stated. I believe, sir, that the power and authority of this Government over the subject of revenue is as full and as broad as it would have been had the first clause of the eighth section of the first article never been amended. But, sir, see to what length the opposite doctrine will lead to! It is claimed that the revenue power should be limited to raising money for the payment of Congress is empowered to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and there is no limit to this power whatever but what Congress may decide upon as arising out of the wants and the duties of the Government. We may borrow money, it seems, and create as many debts as we please in fulfilling any duty which we conceive to rest up on the Government, but we cannot in the exercise of the revenue power accomplish the same end and avoid a circuity of action by drawing directly upon the people.

Now, sir, I have but one authority to cite upon this part of this case, and I propose to show from the writings of Mr. Calhoun himself that this narrow view of the revenue power, which it has been attempted to restrict by confining it to cases within the express provisions of the delegated powers, was not the view entertained by that distinguished man of the meaning of the Constitution. In speaking about this very clause of the Constitution which has elicited so much dis-cussion in connection with this bill, Mr. Calhoun said:

cussion in connection with this bill, Mr. Calhoun said:

The first power delegated to Congress is comprised in these words: "To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." First, the power is given to lay taxes; next, the objects are enumerated to which the money accruing from the exercise of this power may be applied, namely, to pay the debts, provide for the defense, and promote the general welfare; and, last, the rule for laying the taxes is prescribed, to-wit, that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform. If the framers had intended to limit the use of the money to the powers afterward enumerated and defined, nothing could have been more easy than to have expressed it plainly. I know it is the opinion of some that the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," which I have just cited, were not intended to be referred to the power of laying taxes contained in the first part of the section, but that they are to be understood as distinct and independent powers, granted in general terms, and are qualified by a more detailed enumeration of powers in the subsequent part of the Constitution.

That is what he says was claimed, but that is not his view of it.

That is what he says was claimed, but that is not his view of it.

If such were, in fact, the meaning intended, surely nothing can be conceived more bungling, awkward, than the manner in which the framers have enacted their intention.

That has been the argument against this bill, that the revenue power in the Constitution must be confined to cases falling within the specific or delegated powers that follow; and that is just what Mr. Calhoun has declared, strict constructionist as he was, that the Constitution did not mean.

If it were their intention to make a summary of the powers of Congress in general terms, which were afterward to be perticularly defined and enumerated, they should have told us so plainly and distinctly; and if the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" were intended for this summary they should have headed the list of our powers, and it should have been stated that, to effect these general objects, the following specific powers were granted.

Can language be more plain? And then he adds:

But suppose the Constitution to be silent, why should we be confined in the application of moneys to the enumerated powers?

I say so, too. Why should we be confined in the application of moneys to the enumerated powers?

Mr. MERRIMON. When did Mr. Calhoun make that speech?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not care when he made the speech. I accept it as his recorded view, and I have too high an opinion of his judgment to think that any subsequent change of opinion as to the politics of the country could affect his position upon a constitutional enterties. question. He says:

There is nothing in the reason of the thing, that I can perceive, why it should be so restricted; and the habitual and uniform practice of the Government coincides with my opinion.

I say if Mr. Calhoun from his stand-point when he made that speech could have honestly entertained the sentiments therein set forth, surely I can entertain similar sentiments at this advanced day in our history. Surely the advocates of the strictest construction cannot object to Mr. Calhoun as an authority on this subject, and he gave it as his deliberate opinion that the first clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution did contain a substantive grant of power to this Government, and that there exists no necessary connection between the revenue and taxing power of the Government and the other enumerated powers in the Constitution, and to this doctrine I fully subscribe.

It would be a profitless task for me to point out the many instances in which Congress has voted the money of the people for objects not within any of the specific powers of the Constitution. The truth is, sir, the only proper limitation upon the powers of the Government in cases like this is in the sense and justice of the people. It has never happened, and I do not think that it ever will happen, that Congress will be in advance of the people in its desires to promote the happiness or mitigate the sufferings of the human race. And if we can find no protests upon record from the people against the many instances in which this Government exerted the blessed powers of charity and benevolence, it is because the strong feelings and sentiments of justice and humanity outweighed the selfish dictates of man, and our people have claimed the right to infuse into the cold and calculating nature of the statesman and politician some of the warm sympathy and generosity which have ever resided in the popular Never did the sage of Monticello indicate a more profound knowledge of the virtues of this people than when, with all his deep-rooted convictions against the exercise of indefinite power, he advocated the bestowment of a fortune upon Lafayette. And when the future glory and grandeur of his country demanded that he should not hesitate to open up the great valley of the Mississippi to the sea, schooled as he was in the principles of strict construction, he sacrificed his scruples for the sake of his country, and found his vindication in the confiding

Sir, this Government has been forced very frequently by the advanced sentiments of the people to acts of charity and benevolence. It it now asked to do something in the interests of patriotism and national unity, to borrow a phrase from the distinguished Senator from Indiana. I can conceive of nothing more worthy or meritorious than the proposed celebration of our national independence, and if I thought that the people of this great country were so far lost to all the promptings of national pride and patriotism as to be unwilling to see the birthday of their independence properly honored in this cen-tennial year, I would regard such a symptom of degeneracy as an evil tennial year, I would regard such a symptom of degeneracy as an evil omen for the future glory and increased greatness of the Republic.

I am not sure, Mr. President, that if it were now proposed for the first time to celebrate this great event in the manner already determined upon, that I would favor the plan. I think I should oppose it. I believe that it is always best to do directly what is proper to be done at all. And I would prefer, if I had my way in this matter, that the proposed celebration should be under the sole direction of the Government of the United States, and that there existed no ground for even the insinuation that a profit may possibly result to any individual from so holy an undertaking as this.

But, sir, we have now no choice about the matter. Whether wisely or unwisely, this Government and this nation are committed to this object. I will not hunt up the record to see who voted for or against object. I will not hunt up the record to see who voted for or against the several acts of Congress which have made the proposed celebra-tion a national affair. It is not a subject for crimination or recrimi-nation. I will not treat it in a party spirit. I will concede to those who passed those laws the same honesty of purpose that I claim for who passed those laws the same honesty of purpose that I claim for myself. It is enough for me to know that the representatives of the people in Congress assembled did decide to celebrate the grandest event in human history by appropriate ceremonies under the direction of a corporation created for the purpose.

It is enough to know that the national authority has been put forth and the broad seal of its commendation stamped upon this enterprise. However much we may wrangle and differ here about our municipal or local concerns, there is no one I believe in this body who does not feel an bonest pride in everything which explicated who does not feel an honest pride in everything which exalts and dignifies the character of our institutions in the eyes of surrounding nations. If we cannot add to the character and dignity of the nation and increase its claims to the respect and confidence of those who may have an interest in depreciating its grandeur and honor, let us not by any act of ours either tarnish or sully its name.

I have heard it said, sir, that the Government, in every act of Congress enacted upon this subject, disclaimed all liability for the expenses enacted upon this subject, discraimed an inability for the expenses of the proposed exhibition, and that no one could impute bad faith to the United States even if, by refusing to aid the enterprise, it should ultimately fail. Sir, this sounds too much like the language of the exchange. All admit that there would in the event supposed be no money liability; but, sir, there are some things in the world, even at this day, the importance and value of which cannot be measured by dol-lars and cents. Do not imagine that those haughty princes and poten-tates whom you have notified of the grand exhibition will ever trouble themselves by looking into your statutes to find an excuse or apology for republican shame. Does any one suppose that, after the formal and high-contracting solemnity of the invitations you have sent to all the nations of the earth to come and meet you on the spot where one hundred years ago your freedom was proclaimed, you could tell them without shame and dishonor that you intrusted their reception and entertainsname and dishonor that you intrusted their reception and entertainment to a company of gentlemen commissioned to take up a subscription to meet the expenses of the occasion; but that, owing to the hardness of the times—the contraction of the currency, it may be—the money could not be raised, and the affair had to be postponed for a hundred years hence? There is not a bawdy chronicle or penny magazine in all Europe that would not hold us up as a laughing-stock to the world, and the derision of maukind, if such a disgraceful failure should attend this centennial business. should attend this centennial business.

Sir, this is a subject with which we cannot afford to trifle. corporation which you have created to conduct and carry out the pro-gramme of the proposed celebration is in no sense a business corporation. I confess that I share in none of the prejudices entertained against corporations. I shall always look to the object in view more than to the means to be employed to attain it, in forming my opinions upon questions like this before us. A stranger to these proceedings would have supposed that the chief object of the proposed appropriation was the endowment of a private corporation for the benefit of its stockholders. I hope, sir, notwithstanding all we have heard about the degeneracy of the times, that we are not sunk quite so low about the degeneracy of the times, that we are not sunk quite so low in the scale of turpitude and degradation as to afford justification for the charge that there is a single person connected with this grand undertaking who would be willing to engage in the business of speculating in the honor and glory of his country. For myself I do not, I cannot believe it. I do not think there is a man worthy of the name who is capable of contemplating the sublime patriotism of the men who declared our independence, and with a knowledge of the sacrifices and perils which they incurred for their country, that could be induced to accept under any circumstances a necessiary advantage. induced to accept under any circumstances a pecuniary advantage for whatever little return he can make to the memory of those to whom he stands indebted for his freedom.

I have said, sir, that I looked more to the object than to the means intended to accomplish it. And what is that object? It is to show to the world what man can do for himself when left to the free choice of the means and agencies to work out his own happiness and prosperity. It is proposed to put in comparison with all the civilized world this great country, with its institutions, its arts, and its industries. I say its institutions, Mr. President, for, although there will be no pavilion at Philadelphia where we can exhibit within a narrow to do in respect of improvements and refinements in every other art, still the thousands of men who shall come here from the four quarters of the globe and from under every system of government known to the world will, from the moment they touch your soil until they leave it, and in every State they shall visit, have before them and placed in comparison with the systems they left behind the great results of one hundred years of "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

And if, in reviewing the unparalleled advancement of our country during this time from a state of colonial vassalage and weakness to its present state of grandeur and power, our invited critics may find fault with the deplorable civil contest through which we have lately passed, let us hope that, while we cannot claim any exemption from the passions and jealousies which drive men to madness and to war, we will at least be able to show them that we are not behind the rest of the world in the cultivation and honest exhibition of those manly virtues which inculcate the lessons of charity and brotherly love. If we shall be unfortunately compelled to admit that the evil prophefulfilled, and that civil war has desolated our land and for a time divided our people, let it be our pride, as I trust it will be, to show to the whole world that a government founded upon the unalienable rights of man has survived our civil dissensions; and while we have had conquerors whose achievements have equaled those of Napoleon and Caser, he Publican has yet been greated at the set of the property of the set of the set of the property of the set of the property of the set of th and Cæsar, no Rubicon has yet been crossed or grenadiers directed to enter these Halls to crush the liberties of the people. For one, sir, I am anxious that this comparison shall be made. We owe it to ourselves, and we owe it more to the memory of the men and patriots whose wisdom and blood have given us our freedom. The immortal even now be looking down upon us from his habitation in the skies, to see in what way we estimate his exalted services. His spirit will to see in what way we estimate his exalted services. His spirit will hover over us during this centennial year, and I trust in God that the influence of his great example will inspire us with something like the wisdom and charity which he exhibited while here below. And while we shall with pride observe the great advancement which has been reached in everything that was capable of improvement since he has departed from earth, we will also rejoice that it has not been permitted to the world to furnish a rival whose virtues or glory can cast a shadow upon his great name. shadow upon his great name.

Land of the West! though passing brief
The record of thine age,
Thou hast a name which darkens all
On history's wide page.
Let all the blasts of fame ring out,
Thine shall be loudest far;
Let others boast their-satellites,
Thou hast the morning star.
Thou hast a name whose character
Of light shall ne'er depart;
'Tis stamped upon the dullest brain,
And warms the coldest heart.

Let us not stop now in this great work. This Philadelphia show, depend upon it, will be of infinite benefit to the human race. The cause of liberty at home and abroad will receive a new impulse from its teachings and inspirations. The state of Europe at this time will be compared with the state of America, and the cause of human freedom may profit by the comparison. Looking into the affairs of other nations as we shall see them represented here we will entertain a higher opinion of our own. The legions of despotism now darken the fairest portions of the earth. Millions of men at this moment are fairest portions of the earth. Millions of men at this moment are under arms ready to do the bidding of kings and emperors and deluge Europe with the blood of its people. With all the light and knowledge of this most enlightened century combined with the influence of the meck spirit of the gospel, the condition of man as regards the enjoyment of liberty is little better in the Old World to-day than it was one hundred years ago. Look at the present state of Europe. Germany is armed and drilled and every energy and resource of that great country is directed to the support of a huge military despotism which is preying on the vitals of her people. Conscription in the midst of seeming peace drags from industry a vast proportion of her inhabitants, and millions of men that might be profitably employed in multiplying the productions of the earth and contributing to the wealth and happiness of the world are dressed in the trappings of war and stand ready to sacrifice their lives in executing some scheme of ambition. France, smarting under the defeats of an ill-advised war, is marshaling her forces and spending her vast treasures in order to be ready at a future day to enter upon a new contest to regain her lost prestige as a warlike power. The huge military power of the north still maintains its despotic sway over its vast empire, and millions of souls there continue to hope in vain for some gleam of popular liberty. Spain, torn and distracted by civil war, is struggling to prop the throne of a feeble prince upon the ruins of a short-lived republic. England, the great seat of European wealth and wisdom, while yielding on one hand to the popular spirit of her people, still has her coercion bills and mutiny acts, and denies to millions of her subjects the common benefits of her wise constitution.

In America alone, with all the mistakes and errors of party, the Government is yet subject to the control and under direction of the people. All the blundering of politicians, all the bitter fruits of the most bitter civil war the world has ever seen, all the usurpations of the hour, all the strain and tension to which our constitutional system has been subjected, have not yet destroyed the temple of American liberty. Despots and tyrants have prayed and wished for its downfall. Its simplicity and grandeur have been felt in the recesses of their haughty palaces and council chambers, and have filled them with hesitation and dismay. It has kept constantly before the eyes of oppressors and tyrants the unpalatable truth that behind all their formidable intrenchments of power there is no security for injustice against the attacks of an enlightened and spirited people. That while man may be blinded for a time into a tame abandonment of his rights, by withholding from him all knowledge of his rank and end in the creation, once the guiding star of freedom dispels the darkness of tyranny from around him, the images of royalty, the purple of oppression, no longer dazzle or intimidate. He becomes converted from a worshiper into an iconoclast, and these objects which inspired him with feelings of mingled devotion and terror, under an awakened sense of his rights and his errors he tramples forever in the dust.

with feelings of mingled devotion and terror, under an awakened sense of his rights and his errors he tramples forever in the dust.

Mr. President, it is said that we are very poor; that we are in debt, and cannot afford this expenditure. Sir, we are not poor, and our debt is within our means of payment. I have never known the plea of economy interposed when the national character was involved. I believe in holding officers to accountability, and watching the expenditure of the public money. But I do not believe in that statesmanship or in that policy which would refuse to every enterprise the aid of the Government because the advantages to be derived from it cannot be calculated in dollars and cents. I believe in the wisdom of cultivating, especially at this time, the national spirit of our people. And if the proposed celebration will only have the effect of softening in some small degree the asperities yet lingering between the sections of this great country, the amount appropriated by this bill could not be better expended than in contributing to such a

It was impossible to devise a plan which would be worthy of the object to be accomplished by this exposition without connecting this Government with it. Had the enterprise been attempted solely by individuals, however wealthy or influential they might be, the affair would not have attracted notice beyond the State in which it originated? Had the States undertaken the matter they could not have negotiated with one another or entered into agreements regarding it, for they are prohibited by the Constitution from making any such agreements and from holding any intercourse with foreign States? It would be strange if the Constitution, while containing barriers like these and in appropriating to itself all power over our international and interstate affairs, should be so very defective as to have left us without any public authority by which and through which the nations of the earth could be invited to share in this most important celebration.

And, sir, independent of the special interest which all must feel in this exhibition as commemorative of our liberty and glory, who can tell what benefits may not result to the material interests of our people from the enterprise proposed? Much has been accomplished within the last one hundred years for the happiness and well-being of our race by the labors and exertions of science. And it cannot be denied that the efforts of those who were ever in advance of those around them in progressive science were met with objections numerous and weighty, which it is well for all did not prevail. This is the last country in the world which should refuse its aid to science. In the beautiful Art-Gallery which adorns this city may be seen a magnificent picture of Columbus struggling to convince the haughty doctors of Spain that the true theory of the earth's surface justified his convictions as to the existence of a western continent. What would not that great man have given if, when he first conceived the thought of his great discovery, he only had an audience to appreciate the grandeur of his bold design? If in that dark day there could have been a show at Madrid like that proposed at Philadephia, it is possible that innumerable blessings in addition to that conferred by the genius of Columbus would have resulted to the human race. Much has been accomplished during the present century in the field of science and art, and it should be both our pride and our duty to compare the part we have performed in this great contest of mind over matter. In summing up the work of the century in philosophy and science, to use the language of one of the most gifted writers of the present cra, we can show what has been done for the interests of our race in these fields of inquiry.

They have lengthened life; they have mitigated pain; they have extinguished diseases; they have increased the fertility of the soil; they have given new securities to the mariner; they have furnished new arms to the warrior; they have spanned great rivers and estuaries with bridges of form unknown to our fathers; they have guided the thunder-bolt from heaven to earth; they lighted up the night with the splendors of day; they have extended the range of the human vision; they have multiplied the power of muscle; they have accelerated motion; they have annihilated space; they have enabled man to descend to the depths of the sea, to soar into the air, to penetrate securely into the noxious recesses of the earth.

But it is claimed that the Constitution in providing for copyrights and patents for the security of authors and inventors has done all which was intended to be done in the interest of science and art. This provision of the Constitution, it is true, was intended to promote the interests of science by giving a premium to those who should bring to light new discoveries and inventions. But if this proves anything, it proves the interest which the people felt in this subject, by withdrawing this power from the States and conferring it on the General Government. It is well known that before the adoption of the Constitution laws were enacted by the several States regulating copyrights and patents, and it has ever been a subject of legislation in all countries; and the transfer of this power from the States to the General Government cannot be construed as making a limitation upon the other powers of Congress. Suppose this power had been left with the States and nothing was said in the Constitution upon the subject of copyrights or patents? Then, with this very power in the hands of the States, the powers of Congress to promote science and art it seems would not be open to this objection. But, sir, this provision was intended to confer authority upon Congress to establish a permanent system to protect inventors and discoverers; and one of the largest departments of your Government is now devoted to this object. It was not the purpose of the Constitution to limit the general authority of Congress by a provision extending its power to cases which would not otherwise fall within it. But even admitting that this is the only way in which Congress can promote the interests of science, which I do not believe, let it be remembered that the avowed object of the proposed exhibition is not the promotion of science or art. In discussing this question we cannot disregard the language of the acts of Congress, which are the groundwork of this whole centennial business. The avowed purposes of the exhibition is the celebration of the ce sion. This is the means to be employed to accomplish another and a distinct purpose.

Mr. CAPERTON. Mr. President, I feel very reluctant to participate in this debate, wearied as I am sure the Senate is with the protracted discussion. I feel impelled to take part in it from the consideration that I am alone among the representatives of the State which I in part represent in voting for this bill. I do not propose to entertain the Senate by a dissertation upon the Constitution or constitutional history, nor do I promise to entertain you with anything in the way of rhetorical exhibition. I feel it due that I should statethe grounds on which I shall give my hearty and earnest support to the bill under consideration, in order that the people whom I in part represent may account for the singular position which I chance to occupy.

This is a bill for an appropriation of money to a national celebration, and the question is whether we have the constitutional right to make such appropriation. I have listened to the various objections upon constitutional grounds, and I shall briefly reply to them.

In the first place, we might very well felicitate ourselves upon the

In the first place, we might very well felicitate ourselves upon the announcement made by the distinguished Senator from Georgia who addressed the Senate yesterday, [Mr. Norwood,] that there are some five or six clauses in the Constitution upon which we justify this bill. That is more than sufficient for our purpose. But I will endeavor to show that there are certainly one or two; I will address myself to one, upon which we might safely rely.

The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to lay taxes, &c., for certain specified purposes, namely, for the payment of debts, to provide for the common defense, and to promote the general welfare. Let us see whether the authority is to be derived under this under this clause. But I think it may well be maintained.

The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to lay taxes, &c., for certain specified purposes, namely, for the payment of debts, to provide for the common defense, and to promote the general welfare. Let us see whether the authority is to be derived under this clause of the Constitution. I know it will be somewhat shocking to those gentlemen who entertain peculiar views as to the powers derivable from the Constitution to attempt to maintain an appropriation under this clause. But I think it may well be maintained.

What is meant by the general welfare? Anything which promotes the great ends and objects enumerated in the preamble to the Constitution, reference to which was made by the Senator from Texas, Mr. Maxey, ] for which he was twitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Maxey,] for which he was twitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Withers] as having proposed to derive authority not from the Constitution but from this preamble. Now, the view taken by the Senator from Texas is altogether defensible. If you ask what "general welfare" embraces, surely it will not be denied that the insuring of "domestic tranquillity" is indispensably necessary to the general welfare. In determining what is included in this expression, you will, and properly, look to the preamble for determining what were the great ends and purposes in ordaining the Constitution, and as one of the great purposes was to insure domestic tranquillity, we may advance that great purpose under the power to lay and collect taxes in order that great purpose under the power to lay and collect taxes in order to promote the general welfare.

Why, sir, if the Congress of the United States believes that this appropriation will have the effect to soften, to relieve, or to remove the unpleasant and unfriendly feelings which were caused by that unfortunate conflict from which we have so lately emerged, it is certainly a great end to be accomplished, and one which may be attempted under the power to which I have referred.

Now, sir, I ask my friends, the strict constructionists, if they can conceive of any exercise of power under that particular provision of the Constitution according to their views? If there can be no occasion for the exercise of power under that particular clause in the Constitution, why was it placed there? They render it superfluous and nugatory, and it might as well be erased. I ask my friend on my right, who addressed some remarks to the Senate the other day, where did Congress get the authority to purchase Louisiana and Florida?

Mr. EATON. Does the Senator from West Virginia refer to me?

Mr. EATON. That question was not put to me, that I recollect, during the time I was discussing this matter, nor did I go into the discussion of the question at all. I simply said that elsewhere, not here, it had been urged that we had the right to do this because of Now, sir, I ask my friends, the strict constructionists, if they can there, it had been urged that we had the right to do this because of the purchase of Louisiana. I did not defend the purchase; I simply said that Mr. Jefferson himself doubted the power to purchase Louisiana, but the great public necessity induced him to do what he believed not to be strictly constitutional.

Mr. CAPERTON. I do not recollect precisely the language of the Senator from Connecticut in answer to the inquiry as to where the power was derived to purchase Florida and Louisiana. He said something about the duty of Congress being to provide pensions; I do not know in what connection or with what meaning, but there was an exercise of power; and under what provision of the Constitution? Where do you find any specific grant of power in the Constitution under which you will support those acts and a number of other acts? Where do you find any authority to provide by appropriations for pensions, for revolutionary pensions? Where do you find a power to make those numerous appropriations, running down through the history of our Government? Where is it, unless it is under the clause which authorizes Congress to levy taxes in order to promote the gen-

I think that of all occasions this is the one where that particular power may and should be invoked in support of the appropriation which is now the subject of discussion. I do not propose to enter into any particular detail of instances, and shall only recall the minds of Senators to a long list of appropriations for medals for the Vienna exposition, for the London exposition, for the Paris exposition, and for the relief of the people of Ireland during the Irish famine. Where did Congress derive authority for those enactments unless it was un-did Congress derive authority for those enactments unless it was under this provision to promote the general welfare?

Mr. EATON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CAPERTON. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. I beg to ask if the Senator from West Virginia says that the money which purchased provisions for the relief of the poor of Ireland was appropriated under that clause of the Constitution which relates to the general welfare of the United States or the general welfare of Ireland? Which? [Laughter.]

Mr. CAPERTON. I will ask the Senator from Connecticut, if it was not under that, to tell the Senate under what clause of the Constitution the authority was derived.

Mr. EATON. That is another question entirely.

Mr. CAPERTON. Yes, sir; and I think it is a fair offset to the inquiry.

But, sir, the Senator from Georgia as well as the Senator from Connecticut, maintains boldly and emphatically that we have no right to make an appropriation to a national celebration. I believe their principal objection and difficulty is to the word "national." I have understood that the question has been asked in the course of the discussion of this question as to whether the Constitution contained the word "nation" or the word "national." Now, I understand that the United States were consolidated for the purpose of making this Government national with reference to foreign nations. Certainly the gentleman cannot object to the employment of the word to that extent. We might compromise. It is national to this extent at least. There was no necessity for inserting the word national or nation in the Constitution any more than there would be occasion for inseribing upon the name of the lord of the forest "this is the lion." We are a nation with reference to foreign nations. We were made so by this very Constitution under which we are now living.

But if gentlemen do not want to, are not willing that we shall rest this appropriation upon this particular clause of the Constitution, let us see if we can find authority for it under another clause of the Consti-In regard to the doctrines of the general welfare, my view is that wherever there is anything to be done which plainly and indisputably has a national character, we can do it under the clause authorizing the raising of money for the general welfare. It must be national, it must be plainly so, to satisfy my mind; it must be indisputably so. That is to say, the act must of course be necessary to be performed; and when it is so, if there is no special provision in the Constitution authorizing the act to be done, then we can come in under "the general-welfare" provision. Otherwise you make the language employed in this particular clause of the Constitution absolutely nugatory and unmeaning. All these appropriations to which I have referred I have no doubt did have reference to that particular clause, for there is specified power under which they could have been allowed.

But, sir, there is a provision in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce between foreign nations and with the Congress to regulate commerce between foreign nations and with the several States. Let us see if it may come under that provision. There is another provision in the Constitution which authorizes the enactment of all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the granted powers. I suppose these strict constructionists contend that in acting under that provision of the Constitution they can do nothing which is not absolutely necessary to carry into execution the granted powers. That I suppose is the view of my friend from Constitution that the constitution that the constitution described the second of necticut; but the language of the Constitution does not admit of any such interpretation, because it is not that Congress has a right to make all laws necessary; it does not say that Congress has the right make all laws necessary; it does not say that Congress has the right to make all laws absolutely and indispensably necessary; but it says Congress has a right to make all laws "necessary and proper." The word "proper" qualifies the preceding word "necessary."

Under this authority to regulate commerce, is there anything in the object for which this appropriation is asked to be made which constant that it is appropriation of the same of the constant of the co nects itself in any manner with commerce? The regulation of commerce, I suppose, means the promotion of commerce. I do not know but that my friends who are so strict in their views of the Constitution might attempt to maintain that, although Congress has the right to regulate, Congress has not the right to promote. I apprehend, however, that everything which promotes commerce can be done lawfully and properly under that clause in the Constitution. Well, sir, has this occasion on account of which we are asked to make this apand between the States? I can only refer to our past experience in regard to those expositions to which Congress has made appropriations. Take the Vienna exposition. What was the result of that? Our artisans went there and made an exposition of their various arts and manufactures, and the result was a very great enlargement of our trade with nations that had never perhaps before had any or a very limited trade with us. I saw it stated somewhere the other day, and I have no doubt of the truth of it, that in the article of leather and leather goods a trade which amounted to some $300,000 or $400,000 was increased to some $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. I saw it stated further, and it is a fact which I have no doubt has come to the attention of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, that one concern in Hartford went to Vienna and exhibited the machinery that they had wrought for the purpose of working in iron and steel, and such was the effect that in a short time thereafter there was an order from the Prussian government for machinery to make a million rifles, and that company actually put in their pockets the sum of $800,000 for the machinery which they furnished. Now I ask my friend who wants to do something for his suffering people, who, he says, are oppressed with debt and taxation, to go with me and unite in an effort to do something in their behalf. There is one single instance of experience, and I cite him that as showing that, in carrying out this great centennial exposition, his people and that class of his people upon whom he most relies will be

Sir, we have not only that experience to satisfy us that we may promise ourselves great benefit from this collection of the industries of the world at Philadelphia on this great occasion, but we have the experience of France and of Great Britain. I shall not occupy the time of the Senate by going into a reference to these facts, but I maintain the proposition as a general one that in every conceivable art, manufacture, and industry, I have no question that our interests will be greatly subserved by this great national exposition.

One word upon another point. When it is said that Congress has a sight to appropriate money for a salebastion than if the gentle.

One word upon another point. When it is said that Congress has no right to appropriate money for a celebration, then if the gentlemen who oppose this bill believe that it can come in under its power to regulate commerce, I ask their assent and support. Why, sir, the object is the celebration; but as incidental to that, in order to hold out all the inducements for the purpose of gathering around the people of Philadelphia on that great occasion from all portions of this country, they have made this a national exposition. I say it was wisely done. It was wisely done, because it was done no doubt with a view to make it as popular and to assemble there as large a number of people as was possible to do, throwing out all sorts of temptations and all sorts of inducements.

It is beneficial in another respect, which was referred to by the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] the other day. It affords to our people, our skilled laborers, the best opportunity that can be afforded for improving in their arts. There they will come, and they will study the improvements that are brought from all portions of the country and from abroad, and we know how apt and ready our skilled artisans are to appropriate to themselves the benefit of suggestions which may come to them in that way. lieve I have seen it stated somewhere that at the London exposition the government actually provided free transportation for all the skilled workmen of the realm, and that they came up there by thousands and tens of thousands in order to avail themselves of that great school, of that great opportunity for education which was afforded by the munificence of the government. I regret, sir, that this Government is not in a condition to extend its appropriations for the purpose of securing a benefit of that kind.

So much for the power under the Constitution to regulate commerce. I shall hasten through, for I am very much indisposed to weary the Senate. But this is objected to upon the score that the Government is becoming a party to a joint-stock company, as the Senator from Georgia said a joint-stock company for speculation. I think I heard my friend from Connecticut make a similar objection. Has it never been that the Government has united with a joint-stock company for the purpose of promoting the great interests of the country? Does the gentleman from Connecticut recollect that as far back as 1816 the Government became a stockholder in a great joint-stock company to the extent of $7,000,000? I refer to the Bank of the United States. Where was the objection then to the Government being a party or a stockholder in a joint-stock company?

It is objected further that this is a subsidy to a joint-stock company. "Subsidy" is a most unpopular word at this particular time. This may have resulted from proceedings had before the Congress of the United States a year or two ago in reference to the Pacific Mail matter. A certain odium has attached to that word, and it is seized upon now and made a synonym for plunder and fraud. It is an unpopular word, and the idea is if you can attach it to any proposition made word, and the idea is if you can attach it to any proposition made before Congress it will destroy it.

I am free and bold to say that I am not opposed to subsidies. In this particular instance, granting that it is a subsidy, how fortunate it is for us now, at a time when the Government is so much embarrassed in her finances that she cannot afford without great inconvenience to embark in any matters of national concern, that we find gentlemen in Philadelphia, patriotic and able, who come forward and enter upon the initiative in this great celebration, the Government being only asked to supply one fifth or one-seventh of the cost. Apart from the asked to supply one fifth or one-seventh of the cost. Apart from the efforts of private individuals, it was the high duty of this Government to contribute largely to the full measure of all that was necessary for a great occasion of this sort, the celebration of the centennial birthday of freedom. But when these patriotic gentlemen about Philadelphia who initiated this movement, who have contributed their money, not upon any sordid calculation of pecuniary gain, but from a generous and noble and patriotic impulse, have come forward and contributed their five or six million dollars, and this Government is to that extent relieved and is only asked to come in and supply about one-seventh of the whole cost necessary to the great coming celebration, what if she does do it by way of subsidy? So with reference to every other thing. If there is a measure of great national importance proposed to be carried out by private enterprise, if it is a matter of great necessity to the Government as a nation, where is the objection to the Government coming in and giving it such aid as it can afford to give? If you will look through the history of subsidies, you will find that that has been a part of the policy of the British government for the last five hundred years, and by means of that as much as anything last five hundred years, and by means of that as much as anything else that government has built up her arts and her manufactures, her navigation and her commerce, until she now is the great creditor nation of all the nations of the world. If we had adopted this system of subsidies, in all probability we now might have successfully competed with England for that carrying trade which she has appropriated to herself exclusively. I believe the attempt was made. I am not very familiar with the history of it, but I believe there were subsidies given to the Collins line. Subsidies had been given by the English government to the Cunard line, and the Collins line was English government to the Cunard line, and the Collins line was started here and subsidies were supplied by this Government until it became weak kneed and finally abandoned the contest.

If we are to build up our carrying trade, we can only do it upon the system of subsidies. It is a convenient way; it is a proper way; there is no constitutional difficulty in the way; and whenever an occasion occurs I shall vote for it. And now, instead of yielding to that opposition to subsidies which has become the shibboleth of party, I say opposition to substitute which has become the simboleth of party, I say now I am an advocate of subsidies. I shall not be restrained by the denunciation of this party or that party from voting in favor of a policy to which I can in my judgment and conscience subscribe.

I am proceeding with this discussion in rather a discursive way, because I only intended to note the objections made by those who oppose the bill, and I therefore omit some matters that I desired to I do not regard for one moment the criticisms and the objections that have been made to this bill with reference to the previous pledges given with regard to the appropriation; that is altogether out of the question. It does not stand in my way one single moment; nor do I regard the assaults that have been made upon the generous and patriotic men who have initiated and carried forward this enterprise to its present condition. The attempt has been made to belittle and absolutely impugn their motives, charging that it is a mere private speculation, charging that it is a ring, that we are asked to make this appropriation for the benefit of a ring. Those charges and objections do not weigh on my mind. I am willing to concede that it is for a ring—yes, sir, a great ring that is encircling that tree of liberty planted one bundred years ago, which is extending its branches until we are emboldened to invite the nations of the world to come and repose under its shade. That is the ring. That is the character which I would ascribe to these gentlemen who have gone on and who have done so much for the advancement of this great national celebration. I did not propose to engage in this discussion; and I should not have said any-thing if it had not been for the objections made to the original proposition. I am satisfied that for great political reasons this enterprise ought to go through. I am satisfied that for special reasons affecting our condition in a commercial point of view it ought to take place; and upon every conceivable ground, without the slightest doubt or misgiving as to our constitutional power, I think it is our highest duty to grant that appropriation, and to secure the benefits of it.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, I did not intend to say a word upon the subject water discovering the Senate and I would not now the subject under discussion before the Senate, and I would not now attempt to speak were it not for the fact that the question here to be decided is about to be decided upon what logicians call false issues. To hear the speeches that have been made to the Senate upon this subject one would suppose that there was a class of Senators here who were opposed to the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia. I do not suppose there is a man in the Senate, I do not suppose in truth there suppose there is a man in the Senate, I do not suppose in truth there is one in all the broad land, who is opposed to the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia. Is there a man here, is there one in all the land, who is not proud of the grandeur, of the glory, of the wealth of this nation of ours? Certainly there can be none. I object, then, that any imputation shall go out to the country upon the patriotism of those who see proper to vote against this bill. I yield for myself to no Senator on this floor in the patriotism which is necessary to the citizen in maintaining the Government under which we live, and I object that there should be any imputation or deduction of a want of natriotism upon my part because I see proper to vote against this patriotism upon my part because I see proper to vote against this bill; nor do I hold that there is any clause in the Constitution pro-hibitory to the appropriation. Among the powers that are granted under the Constitution there are implied powers, and those powers then go forward and merge into expediencies, and from these expediencies it becomes the province of the Congress of the United States oftentimes to vote money in cases where the authority would be difficult if it were endeavored to be traced in the express language of the Constitution.

The Government as framed by our fathers was framed for a particular purpose; but as the population extends, as the country grows in wealth, the Constitution was made to expand itself, and be at all times sufficient for the protection and the outgrowth of the Governtimes sufficient for the protection and the outgrowth of the Government. This Government is a government of the people, and while Senators present the fact that the government of Great Britain gave its treasure in support of the great international exhibition at London, that France gave its treasure in support of the great international exhibition at Paris, and that the Austrian government gave its protection also and its treasure in support of the exhibition at Vienna, they would go further and say that the government also paid the officials, and that the government at those exhibitions was represented in all its strength in all its property. But the Government in all its strength, in all its power, in all its glory. But the Government of the United States is different from these. While I would urge forward the citizens of this nation to the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia and to the celebration of the centennial day of Independence everywhere in the broad land, I would endeavor to preserve the distinctive character of our Government when contrasted with the governments of the Old World. This is a Government of the people, and the centennial exhibition should represent the people of this nation, by whose consent they are governed and by whose power the Government is maintained. The characteristic difference between the governments of the Old World and the Government of the New, the one that we represent, should be maintained even at the Centennial, and the Centennial at Philadelphia should represent the patriotism of the people, the outburst of the people of the nation, whose Government it is, and not the power of a government that controls and man-

I hold that the wealth of this nation owes something to the Government. Do the wealth and intelligence of this country owe nothernment. ing to the Government except merely that which is enacted by law? The wealth of the country, the possession of that wealth, the title to that wealth, are maintained by the virtue and intelligence of the people which takes the form of law by the consent of the people and is made to give protection to the possessions which they hold. The holders of the wealth of the country owe it to the country that in all exhibitions of this kind they should represent their patriotism—a patriotism which they owe to the Government which maintains them in the possession of their fortunes. The poverty, the toiling millions of the country, should not under the coercion of law be called upon to give these exhibitions for the amusement or for the benefit of others. I repeat, does the wealth of the country owe nothing except those duties which are defined by law? It certainly does. Without the consent of the people, without the voice of the people upholding and maintaining the resources of this land, their title is liable at any time to waste away. The men of wealth throughout the land should be permitted to come forward without any coercion on the part of the Government and make these exhibitions of their patriotism for the benefit of the masses of the people. In order to afford the opportunity to them to do this, it should be stripped of all the attributes of coercion

Certain gentlemen in Philadelphia saw proper to come forward and ask for an act of incorporation, that they might be protected under the law of the country and that the Government by giving this act of incorporation should recognize, as far as is proper to be recognized, its consent and the consent of the people; and no further than this should the people be required to contribute, certainly not one dime beyond what they willingly give from their own purses.

I regret that a single word has fallen from any Senator on this for assailing or impugning the motives of the people of Philadelphia, who have gone forward in a spirit of enterprise, or, if you please, prompted by the desire of gain, in order to make this exhibition a success. They are entitled to the commendation of every man in the land. They deserve the approbation of the people everywhere. But, when they come to ask that the Congress of the United States shall when they come to ask that the Congress of the United States shall furnish the means, they undertake to make the international exhibition at Philadelphia conform to the character of exhibitions which have been held in the Old World. Must my patriotism be impugned if I refuse here to tax the people of the State which I in part represent, or to take a portion of the money which is derived from the taxes that accrue from their labor, for the purpose of carrying forward this exhibition? Must my patriotism be called in question when I present the fact that there are dozens of men in Philadelphia and New York whose wealth nearly equals the value of the whole and New York whose wealth nearly equals the value of the whole taxable area of the land of the State which I in part represent? Must my patriotism be impugned, or must I be held to be opposed to the centennial exhibition, if I refuse here to divert a portion of the tax which is derived from the poor laboring-men of the South, or of the East, or of the West, derived from their hard earnings, in order to contribute to a great national exhibition that is now on foot, that to contribute to a great national exhibition that is now on foot, that is to be in full glow in Philadelphia on the 4th of July, 1876? Must Congress be represented at the Centennial? Must the Government be represented there? I hold that the people should be represented at the Centennial and that the Government should only give its recognition in a form and to an extent sufficient to enable them to go forward in doing what patriotism demands they should do.

I know it is said that Congress is asked to give only a million and a half. Only a million and a half! Truly we are a great people who can speak so flippantly of this large sum. Our large wealth is represented by the debt which we owe; $2,000,000,000 represents the debt of the nation; three thousand millions will scarcely cover the debts now horne by the State and manifold several cover the debts now borne by the State and municipal governments. Truly a stupendous sum; the mind can with difficulty compute its magnitude. This debt must be paid; paid by the sweat of the toiling millions. Only a million and a half! a sum above the annual cost of most of the State governments of this Union. Only a million and a half!

But, sir, the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL,] in the very handsome and well-considered speech that he delivered yesterday, Shall our Government issue its cards of invitation to a centennial banquet and send them to the representative heads of all the civilized governments on earth, and yet, when these governments shall have responded to the invitation and shall be seated at our festal board, shall it be said that the host is absent?

Who is to be the host at the centennial exposition? Does the Senator imply by what he has said that the Government shall be there as the host; that the Government has extended these invitations to the powers of the earth to come here and witness the grandeur and glory of this nation? And if the Government has extended these written invitations, I ask whether the Government intends that its guests shall pay the expenses of their coming to sit around its festal board? Is it the purpose of the Government of the United States, taking the language of the Senator from Oregon, to extend these invitations to the powers of the earth to come and sit around this festal board and then require the guests to foot the bills? If you do not intend to require the guests to foot the bills? quire the guests to foot the bills, they being the guests of the United States, how do you propose to pay them? Do you propose by a further tax on the people to raise the money necessary to pay the bills after they have been made and the estimate of the cost has been ascertained? It seems to me that if we have invited these guests, if the invitations have gone out and they must come and sit around the banquet that the nation has prepared for them, it will be necessary that we shall provide the means for the payment for the entertainment of our guests, and that we shall in truth be chargeable with meanness and parsimony if we fail to provide the means for the payment of the cost of the entertainment.

In order to avoid a difficulty of this kind, and in order to absolve the Government and its treasures from any association with the cen-tennial exhibition, I would divorce it just here and make good that divorce, which was the intention of the framers of the bill first introdivorce, which was the intention of the framers of the bit his introduced, as was set out and clearly and unmistakably placed in the act of incorporation. I would make good the words of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] who stated in his place at the time the act of incorporation was passed, when the invitations were given, that they did not propose to ask the Government of the United States for the control of the control of the United States for the control of the cont

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not quite that.

Mr. ALCORN. I will stand corrected if the Senator says "Not quite that."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine I did not mean in a general sense; but I would like the Senator, when he quotes that act, to look at the language. If he will look at the language he will see its precaution.

Mr. ALCORN. I ask the Senator's pardon. I was speaking in regard to what the Senator from Pennsylvania said in the discussion that arose on the bill, not with regard to the language of that act it-

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator was putting an interpretation on that bill itself.

Mr. ALCORN. Not at all.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator. Mr. ALCORN. I refer to the declaration made at the time by the Senator from Pennsylvania who is not now in his seat, when the objection was made that the incorporators would come to Congress and ask the assistance of the Government in carrying forward this enter-His answer was emphatic that the Government would not be sked under any state of circumstances to contribute one dollar to the exhibition that was proposed to be held.

Now, sir, in the face of these declarations, and in the face of the act of incorporation itself, we see the Senator come forward and ask that a million and a half of dollars shall be appropriated in order to finish the buildings that are now reported to be far on the way to being finished, and that excel in grandeur and in proportion anything that has ever been seen in the world. I am gratified to hear that the buildings are upon so extensive a scale, that the grandeur of the people is represented in so striking and forcible a manner; and I propose that the buildings shall represent the generous outpouring of the wealth of this country, the patriotism of the people, and that there shall not be impressed upon those buildings or upon the international exhibition the evidences of coercion on the part of the Government that any man has contributed one dollar, except what came from him with his own consent. Let that be the course pursued, and this exhibition will represent the people; it will represent the wealth, the patriotism, and the power of the people; and it will be stripped of all the attributes of coercion upon the part of the Government, and thus it will be presented in contrast, and it will be a beautiful contrast, with the exhibitions that were given in the Old World.

But my friend from Texas who is not now in his seat [Mr. Maxey] and my honored friend from West Virginia who is in his seat [Mr. Caperton] seemed to imply that there are those in the Senate who are absolutely opposed to their enjoying the high privilege of going to the Centennial. No, Mr. President, I say to each of them go and may all joy go with you, my friend; but as you whirl on the highway upon a railroad train, perhaps with a dead-head ticket in your pocket, to go there and represent the grandeur of the nation, go at your own to go there and represent the grandeur of the nation, go at your own expense; do not tax the poor people down in my country who are denied the privilege on account of their poverty of going out to see the world. The rich enjoy themselves. They enjoy the protection of the Government, They should be mindful of the fact that the Government protects them in all they possess; that it is under the institutions which we foster and maintain that they have been enabled to gather this wealth. They have the privilege, they have the capacity of going out and looking at the world; and though they may not without the consent of the people be chosen for the high places in the land, out the consent of the people be chosen for the high places in the land, still if they have wealth they have it within their power to go out and look at the grandeur, the beauty, and the glory of the world. But the poor who toil from early dawn until the sun goes down and the horizon closes around them are denied even the privilege of going ont and looking at the world. Is not the wealth of this nation, repre senting its grandeur and its power, sufficient of itself to contribute the means necessary to the grand exhibition at the Centennial with-out going to the pockets of the poor, to the labor of the poor, to ask them to contribute from their toil and from their sweat and their hard earnings to push forward and to advance the Centennial at Phila-

Ah, Mr. President, there are other reasons, and I might just as well state them here. The section that I represent has been desolated by the hand of war. The flame followed in the track of the sol-dier, and the land was charred of all that was valuable upon its sur-The slaves that belonged to the orphan and the widow were made free. That people sit brooding in poverty and desolation to-day; and they owe and they feel and they pay that devotion which is proper from good citizens to the Government of the United States; is proper from good citizens to the Government of the United States; but when you come to tax their scanty garments, while they toil from day to day for the bread of life, in order that they shall contribute to the great centennial exhibition, may I not say that I refuse to vote for such a bill without having an imputation cast upon my patriotism? The wealthy can go, and God speed them as they do go; but how can these people go? They have no reserved seats. The gates will be closed upon them except they thrust their hands into their packets and from their scanty means pay the contribution that their pockets and from their scanty means pay the contribution that is levied at the gates of the Centennial upon the patriotism of the peois levied at the gates of the Centennial upon the patriotism of the people. While you pay your tribute to patriotism, and while you go forward to see the beauty and grandeur of this Centennial, I will not coerce from any man's pocket one cent. Let it be a free offering, a patriotic offering, representing the love of country and the love of liberty innate and inherent in the people of this land.

But, sir, the war did more than I have stated. It became necessary as the struggle progressed to strike from the pension list the soldiers of the South who had fought in the war of 1812. Must I not think of that regiment-ah, it is not a regiment-that company of octogenarians who are now bending their way to their graves, who were stripped of their property; who are too old to labor; who are not able to obtain by the sweat of their brows their daily bread? These objects of charity nevertheless contribute in some degree to the revenues of the country; if from no other means, the tobacco that consoles them at the silent hour of night pays a tax to the Government. They have been denied their pensions; they have been stricken from the pension-rolls; they are now, as I say, bending into their graves. Shall I be accused of a want of patriotism if I refuse to take a portion of that tax derived from the pipe of the poor old soldier or the tobacco that he carries in his pouch—shall I be accused of a want of patriotism if I refuse to divert a dime of that tax to the great cen-

Again, sir, of the remaining property of the people of the South, and of the people of my own State, there was taken in violation of law, after the war ended, cotton which was sold and now represents $12,000,000 in the Treasury of your Government. The proceeds of this property have been held by the courts of the country, by the Chief-Justice of the United States, to be money held in trust for the benefit of the owners. While it is so held in the Treasury, and while the people of the State that I represent and the people of the South hold out their hands and ask that this may be given to them, and it is denied to them, shall I be accused of a want of patriotism because I refuse to vote an appropriation for a great centennial exhibition while this injustice rests upon the people of Mississippi and of the South?

In no spirit of complaint do I make this utterance, but I make it in the language of a protest that I shall not be charged with a want of patriotism because I see proper to withhold my support from a measure like this. Go forward, Senators, with your centennial exhibition, but when you do, go forward as American citizens, free with your own means, without any of the attributes of coercion, without any of the revenues derived from the people under the force of law by the giving of the money that is enforced from the hard-working men of this

But there has been a great deal said here about patriotism, and we have had gushing speeches made upon the duty of the Government.

Mr. President, there are some herbs that are a little too sweet to be wholesome; and when I hear such gushing utterances of patriotism, wholesome; and when I hear such gushing utterances of patriotism, if I did not know so well who the parties were, I should suspect that there was a good deal of lip-service on the part of those Senators without springing and welling up from the heart. I make no professions here at all of patriotism, except to say that I yield to no man in patriotic devotion to this country; I yield to no man in the admiration that I have for its gradeur, its glory, its wealth; I yield to no man in the wish that it may endure forever; but in order that it may endure forever, and that it may go forward and lose none of the attributes that have made it grand as it is, I would strip all centennial exhibitions and all shows that are made for the amusement or for the edification of the people of the attribute of coercion, and let them stand based upon the will, the patriotism, and the liberality of the people. Let the wealthy give this, that the poor may have the privilege

But, sir, there is not so much patriotism in this thing, I think, as some of the gushing Senators would imagine. Look, if you please, just here within the range of your vision and see the monument that thirty years ago was laid in its foundation a monument to the glory, the greatness, the patriotism, and the Christian virtues of the Father of his Country. It stands with its column still broken, unfinished. Where is the patriotism in the country that will falter or hesitate to go forward and finish that monument? We asked the nations of the earth to contribute their relics of antiquity, their works of art, in order that we might beautify that monument to be erected to Washder that we might beautily that monument to be erected to wasnington. These valuable relics and these valuable contributions from the lands of the earth are here inclosed in a wooden building that sits at the base of the monument, and there they have remained for the last quarter of a century, and the patriotism of the country when appealed to has up to this time failed to respond to the demand of the country that the monument should be finished. If you talk about a triotism and about huilding monuments to the glory of our areas. country that the monument should be finished. If you talk about patriotism and about building monuments to the glory of our ancestors, I say then go with me and let us finish the Washington Monument with this million and a half dollars, and that will stand and endure forever. [Applause in the galleries.] But when you come to an international show, made for the amusement of the people and for the enjoyment of those who are able to participate in that enjoyment, let the wealthy provide for it; let the millionaires of the North—and God prosper them in their wealth—while they drive around Fairmount Park helpind their splendid $20.000 spans reflect that they have con-Park behind their splendid $20,000 spans, reflect that they have con-Fark behind their splendid $20,000 spans, reflect that they have contributed of their own means to this great entertainment. True, their bonds are safe, are secure from the tax-gatherer. You cannot reach them with your tax-gatherer. Your law does not reach a bondholder, but reaches the poor man in Mississippi and in Kansas, and takes from his pocket the hard earnings of his labor to contribute to this fair in order that the bondholders may drive around Fairmount Park at his expense. Let them go and drive, and I shall be glad to see them, for I envy no man, nor do the people I represent envy any of the men of this great land of ours. They owe their wealth to the institutions of the country: but in the name of the masses of the people, the hardthe country; but in the name of the masses of the people, the hardworking, toiling millions, who will never see the centennial exhibition at Fairmount Park, I protest that they shall not be taxed for a show that is made to exhibit the grandeur and the wealth of this nation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the nation to-day mourns the death of a distinguished statesman, of a learned lawyer, of a true patriot; many of us of a former companion and friend. Without dispatrot; many of us of a former companion and friend. Without distinction of party, the people lament to-day that the country will never again have the living counsels of Reverdy Johnson. Within the last ten days I received, as one or two other Senators did, a slip of anewspaper giving to the country his views on the constitutionality of the appropriation which is now being considered by the Senate. I know that there are other statesmen of a different school who differ from him in opinion; but I will ask the favor of having his views on this constitutional question read from the desk, and with that I close my remarks.

BALTIMORE, January 25, 1876.

MY DEAR MR. RANDALL: During my recent visit to London I was glad to find the interest generally felt there in our approaching Centennial.

My DEAR MR. RANDALL: During my recent visit to London I was grad to find the interest generally felt there in our approaching Centennial.

The power to levy taxes, &c., and to borrow money, vested in Congress without limitation as to amount, to pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare, to minds of ordinary comprehension, not shackled by astute and nice distinctions—distinctions which would deprive the Government of powers most essential to its wholesome operation—would seem to be clear. Congress has made appropriations involving this question of power which the people never objected to, and which were never the subject of serious dispute. Not to mention other instances, they have provided for the relief of those whose properly has been destroyed by earthquake. They have established an Agricultural Bureau, erected extensive buildings, provided for the purchase of seeds, &c., abroad, authorized an annual report of its proceedings, and published it annually in very large numbers and at a very great expense. There is no express power in the Constitution to authorize this. Its legality, therefore, must rest upon implied and not express powers. The former are as much delegated as the latter, as these could not be carried out advantageously without the aid of the former. Under the clause referred to, which authorizes the levying of taxes, it will be seen to be the object to pay the debts of the United States and also to provide for the common defense and general welfare. These latter terms are not to be fulfilled without the means afforded by the taxing power. But, as will be seen, the power to tax, to provide for the common defense and general welfare, is given in the same words as the power to provide for the payment of the debts. Whatever, therefore, Congress may think will promote the common defense and general welfare, and which money can accomplish, may be done with the money supplied by the taxing power. And upon this point the decision of Congress must be conclusive. Independent who declared and made us to be a nation, but on the contrary remember them with grateful reverence?

There are some I know, though I suppose they are now but few, who apply to the Constitution a strictly literal construction. These deny that the United States is a nation, and, as it is certain that the States are not a nation, the consequence would be that a people of forty-three millions and as many more as may come into being under the present Constitution are living under a Government which has no national character. It is true, relative to all concerns with foreign nations, the United States is invested with ample powers. Congress can alone regulate commerce with them, and the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, can make treaties with and appoint representatives to other countries. But, say the strict constructionists, the Constitution nowhere declares that the United States is a nation, and no implication is admissible to prove it to be one.

If such an interpretation of our organic law was to prevail, the United States would be without powers essential to its prosperity, and be reduced to the mere dimensions of a petry municipality. It is not to be supposed, therefore, that Congress, in acting upon the matter of the Centennial, will be governed by so narrow and ruinous a construction.

Knowing how much you have at heart the success of the approaching celebration,

Knowing how much you have at heart the success of the approaching celebration, I venture to trouble you with this communication.

I remain, with regard, your friend and obedient servant,

REVERDY JOHNSON.

Mr. CONOVER. Mr. President, I had no thought or intention of participating in this debate, content to leave the matter in the hands of older Senators, more experienced in debate and more competent to deal with the general features of the subject. But now, even after the very thorough discussion which has been had, I find myself con-strained to ask attention to a few remarks, from a settled conviction that very much less than merited attention has been given to what strikes my mind as being of the greatest possible consequence that may result from our action. I allude to the possible and, as I think, very probable efficiency of a well-conducted exposition, if animated with the proper feeling, in securing that entire and emphatic reunion of every section of our country in a common sentiment of patriotism and that complete restoration of an all-pervading and comprehensive fraternity now for many years so ardently desired by all right-minded men in all parts of our land.

I do not care to discuss the question of legality or constitutionality of the appropriation asked for. That has been already ably handled, and I believe under all the circumstances is entirely dominated by considerations of paramount consequence to the general peace and welfare, and are already practically decided by the universal voice of the whole people, which is of co-ordinate supremacy with that of the Constitution itself.

the Constitution itself.

I believe that a national gathering of the people from every State and Territory of the Union will demonstrate beyond a doubt the prevalence of an earnest desire for a decided and emphatic resumption of kindly and friendly feelings throughout the whole extent of the land. The precise period of the termination of hostilities was long ago exactly determined by the highest legal and judicial authority. It is full time that, by some equally emphatic movement of the people themselves, as precise and decided a termination be given to the heartburnings, jealousies, and recriminations that have inevitably resulted from the war. "Let us have peace" really and truly.

I believe that the exposition will directly and powerfully promote that harmony and internal peace upon which more than upon all other conditions our national strength and prosperity depend.

The near approach of the hundreth anniversary of the declaration to which we all acknowledge our obligation seems to have stirred the heart of the nation to its very depths. From every State and section, heart of the nation to its very depths. From every State and section, by men of every party and holding every conceivable shade of political doctrine has been manifested an eager desire that, after the trials and dangers, the blessings and the rewards of a century, we should, in some formal and decided manner, announce to the world that as an intelligent and thoughtful people we fully recognize and appreciate the innumerable blessings that have come to us from the operations of the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and that we call the attention of the nations of the world to our own progress and condition, as giving incontestible proof of the sufficiency and perfect dition, as giving incontestible proof of the sufficiency and perfect adaptation of popular government to the progressive and permanent advancement of a free people.

I know of no way in which an intelligent, industrious, and prosperous people can, in better accordance with the principles of their government, with more credit to themselves or more beneficially to the world, make a more decided acknowledgment of their appreciation of the inestimable value to them of one hundred years of continued prosperity and of the significant fact that all this unprecedented prosperity has to a great extent been based upon actual work, upon skilled labor, than in gathering together in hundreds of thousands to do special honor to mechanical industries and inventions as the only reliable and effective source of national growth and greatness.

It is strikingly edifying and wholesome for the wealthy, the wise, and the learned occasionally to glance over the condition of the whole world in this particular respect and compare the comfort, the hopefulness, and the certainty of success which invariably await upon the efforts of intelligent labor here, with the poverty and degradation, the suffering in the present and the gloomy hopelessness in the future that hang over the lot of the laborer in so many less favored lands. I leave to others the privilege of better illustrating the thousand benefits that will result to our own mechanical processes and industrial pursuits from such an opportunity as will be afforded by the exposipursuits from such an opportunity as will be afforded by the exposi-tion for comparing the masterpieces of our own skill with the results of ages of continued improvement accomplished elsewhere, but can-not doubt that so desirable a project will meet with ultimate success; for, even if the Government should shrink from the responsibility which it has already assumed, I feel sure that the people themselves will sustain it, and that already its success is assured. I am so im-pressed with the importance and grandeur as well as the strangeness of the scene that will be presented and which is so well portrayed in the address of the commissioners to the neonle of the United States the address of the commissioners to the people of the United States that I quote briefly from them:

when we add to such an exhibition of our own progress and present attainment the thousand rare productions, the many curious and valuable arts, and the rich and varied manufactures that will crowd to our country from every nation on the globe; when we reflect that in the exposition of 1876 the hoary civilization of prehistoric times will freely mix with that of nations that are as of to-day, that the citizens of the stripling nation of only a single century will jostle with the children of the remote and mysterious nations of the farther East, whose dim and mystic records are almost obliterated by the angust march of untold centuries; when we remember that, from the polar snows of Russia, and the fervent sands of Africa, and the solemn forests and mighty rivers of South America, the strangely varied races of men shall come in throngs, each bearing his appropriate tribute, we begin to appreciate the magnitude of the occasion.

Mr. President, it is only with the hope that what I say may possibly have some little effect in giving such a character of hearty good-will and cordial good feeling to the projected exposition as may have a tendency to rekindle in southern hearts that old love of our common country, the country of our children and the country of our fathers, that has induced me to say one word.

A little proper effort will again arouse in the hearts of southrons the same pride and glory in the American name for which they were the same pride and giory in the American name for which they were distinguished in years gone by. And while I shall certainly, whenever opportunity is offered, give my vote in favor of the appropriation in aid of so patriotic and useful an undertaking, I still have no fears that the failure of this bill will necessarily involve the failure of the exposition. Only make it instinct throughout with a feeling of gratitude and of exultation at the prospect of a speedy and full return to internal and cordial peace and unity, and success is assured.

I speak from personal and positive knowledge of what I affirm when I say that many of the leading and most influential of the citizens of the South will gladly hail the return of real peace and sincere good-will. High-spirited and manly, they are not disposed to confess to any what may be called their political sins, and they require from none any instruction or exhortation as to the fatal stupidity of the secession movement, for manifold demonstrations of its folly are engraved upon their hearts. Still, while reluctant to confess their errors, thousands are waiting the opening of some honorable door of access to a full and final resumption of the cordial and hearty relations of

My own feelings in this respect are so well portrayed in the address of the Centennial Commission, which was drafted by a personal friend and fellow-citizen of my own State and a northern man like myself, that I will close my remarks by quoting the language used in that address, and which I have reason to believe truthfully represents the feelings of all intelligent southern men, and which I adopt as an apt expression of my own views:

There is a possible mission for the contemplated exposition, in the importance and value of which all other probable results are nearly lost in insignificance.

The nation has recently experienced one of those deadly convulsions which might have been historically expected to attend the course of other governments, but from which we had fondly but vainly hoped that our own, founded upon the safe and sure basis of universal equality and political right, would have been spared.

How terrible was that conflict let the spirits of the hundreds of thousands of brave men who fell as its victims whisper in the solemn language of the grave.

The strife is finished. The terrible harvest of death has been gathered, and the only present consolation is that the one element of inevitable bitterness and constant danger is now thoroughly climinated from the field of national discussion, and the majesty of the Declaration and the sanctity of the Union are sadly but solemnly vindicated.

And what now! Shall the bitterness and over the constant that the constant danger is now thoroughly climinated from the field of national discussion, and the majesty of the Declaration and the sanctity of the Union are sadly but solemnly vindicated.

stant danger is now thoroughly climinated from the field of national discussion, and the majesty of the Declaration and the sanctity of the Union are sadly but solemnly vindicated.

And what now? Shall the bitterness and animosity engendered by the war remain forever? Is final reconciliation utterly hopeless?

No truly generous mind can fail to appreciate and respect the soreness and despondency that follow always as attendant upon severe defeat; and when to these, whether from other circumstances or as resulting from legislation temporarily necessary, there is added a deep and despairing sense of decradation and subjection, every noble and generous sentiment of the human hear is stirred, and the earliest possible resumption of friendly and fraternal relations is demanded by the heart and judgment of the majority of the forty million citizens of this restored and reunited country, with a power and an emphasis that will ere long command obedience.

So thousands of brave and noble hearts in every section and of every party in our country are yearning inexpressibly for the full and entire restoration of the kindly and fraternal relations that in the time before this terrible war existed between the citizens of this goodly land. How long shall such appeal in vain?

How rapidly the signs and mementos of the war are passing away: stockades are decaying, earth, works are crumbling away, and over all, as well as the innumerable graves of the unknown dead, kindly and loving nature is rapidly drawing her beautiful mantle of refreshing verdure to hide them away from the sight and recollection of all! How long ere the hearts of the people shall fully respond to the gentle intimation, and all the errors of the past be hidden in high and holy aspirations for the future of our restored nationality?

It is to be hoped that every trace of soreness and bitterness arising from the war may be obliterated by common consent.

Then, on the 4th day of July, 1876, from every corner of this broad land, from mountain to valley, from shop

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, my natural impulses incline me to favor any measure or movement looking to an appropriate celebration of the centennial natal day of our country. I yield to nore in the measure of my love and reverence for the memory of the great and good men who achieved American Independence, and I trust that the American people, when the next Fourth of July shall come, will not anywhere be remiss in their duty in doing such acts and inaugurating such ceremonies and patriotic movements as will evince to the world how well and how truly they love and honor the memory of those who secured to them freedom and free institutions. While I am thus in favor of such a celebration, I must be permitted to exercise a practical judgment in reference to the means to be employed to that end.

The Congress of the United States is asked here to appropriate, to donate a million and a half of dollars—a very large sum, that is at this time—to complete the preparations for a celebration of the Fourth of July next at a particular place and in a particular way. I think that this is unnecessary and unwise. I believe that the celebration which ought to take place should be the free offering of the patriotic heart of America. I believe that if proper application is made the American people will not hesitate to make a voluntary contribution of money sufficient to make the celebration at Philadelphia what it ought to be. If their patriotism is not sufficient to induce them to do it voluntarily, how scandalous it will be that their representatives in Congress assembled shall undertake to compel them to do it by the power of a statute. What a shameful mockery of patriotism is such The people are to be forced to manifest their love of a proposition!

The history of the proposed celebration shows that it was intended that it shall take place exactly in the way I have indicated. When Congress granted a charter to certain patriotic gentlemen to make provision for this grand international exhibition of arts, products, &c., of all nations, they gave them the benefit of doing so under the auspices of the Government; they gave dignity and character in that way to their proposed movement; they gave them the material advantages that that would secure to them; but it was expressly provided in the original act of incorporation, in the first section thereof, that while they should have the benefit of this clause—

That an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures shall be held, under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1876—

That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same.

Thus there was an express declaration on the part of Congress that while these corporate authorities should provide for and conduct this proposed exhibition under the auspices of the Government, it should be done free of expense to the Government. It was the policy of Congress in passing this act with this provision in it that the money congress in passing this act with this provision in it that the money necessary to defray the expenses necessary to that end should be the free, patriotic offering and contribution of the American people. That act was approved March 3, 1871. Another act enlarging the corporate powers granted was passed and approved June 1, 1872, and in that act it was again provided that—

Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, nor for any claim, by the centennial international exhibition, or the corporation hereby created, for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support or liquidation of any debts or obligations created by the corporation herein authorized

There has never been any act or resolution on the part of Congress by which the United States as a nation should be committed to pay one dollar toward this celebration of the Fourth of July or any other that may take place in the country. On the contrary, these provisions were incorporated into these acts for the express purpose of controverting and cutting off any such idea or any pretense whenever or wherever or by whomsoever it might be set up. It seems that it was expected that the opportunity would be seized upon at once, that it would be gladly done!

I do not oppose this appropriation upon the ground that Congress has not the constitutional power to make it. I believe it has such power; and there might be a contingency in which I would be willing to vote for the appropriation asked for or even a larger one. If I could be convinced that the honor of the nation was imperiled if I could be convinced that the honor of the nation was imperied if this appropriation were not made, I should not hesitate one moment to vote a million and a half, or three millions, or five millions of dol-lars; but nothing has been said or shown in this debate, nothing has been brought to my attention by any one in or out of the Senate which goes to show any such state of things. The truth is there is no necessity for this appropriation. It is to be a gift in effect, and nnnecessary gift, of one and a half million dollars to a corporation, the money to be drawn from the people at a time when they are oppressed and greatly distressed with excessive taxes and when the industries of the country are languishing and prostrate, when, above all other times, they are least able to pay so great a sum. The money is thus to be forced from them to make a display and show which comparatively few of them can see, participate in, or enjoy.

Why is it not just and fair to let those who can enjoy it and realize the great pecuniary benefits arising from it pay for it? The city of Philadelphia itself could well afford, in view of the advantages that Philadelphia itself could well afford, in view of the advantages that are to accrue to that people, to contribute every dollar that is demanded. They I believe could have afforded to expend all the money that has been or may be necessary to complete the exhibition, beginning it at the beginning. There are railroad interests in the State of Pennsylvania that could well afford to do it. Take the great Central Railroad Company of Pennsylvania, which controls a hundred millions of property; 1½ per cent. upon the property owned and controlled by one corporation would supply them with the funds needed. New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore could well afford to spend this sum. What vast advantages in trade they will replize from this sum. What vast advantages in trade they will realize from this grand exhibition! They cannot afford in a business and commercial point of view to allow it to fail; they will not do so. The American people generally, when properly applied to, will not allow it to fail.

Nothing has been said here, nothing has been said anywhere to convince reasonable men that this amount of money cannot be raised by a proper application to the people and particularly those who are to be so richly benefited pecuniarily.

In further support of the view that I have submitted that there is no necessity for this appropriation, and that Congress contemplated that no such provision should be made, that the Government should not be called upon for money, the last act to which I referred contains this provision:

That the centennial board of finance shall have authority to issue bonds, not in excess of its capital stock, and secure the payment of the same, principal and interest, by mortgage upon its property and prospective income.

I beg to ask the honorable chairman who reported this bill, if any such mortgage has been made by this company. He answers me and says that no such mortgage has been made. The property owned now by this corporation must amount to several millions of dollars; now by this corporation must amount to several millions of dollars; and are we to be told that, by a proper mortgage upon that property, as was contemplated by this act by its express terms, a million and a half dollars cannot be raised upon it? No business man can so believe for one moment. The property there now is thus available, and the receipts of money from the exhibition will be increased, amounting to several millions. It must be remembered that visitors have to pay to see the celebration; it is not to be free to all without price. If they do not put a mortgage on their property, as they may do, am I not warranted in inferring that the purpose is to get an appropriation—a gift—of a million and a half dollers, so that in the end the stock-holders in this corporation may realize profits by this patriotic enterprise? When I came to look at the acts of incorporation this morning I was astonished to see the provision, which I will read, in one of them. I had supposed it could not be contemplated by any one that a dollar paid to the corporation should be devoted to any other than patriotic purposes, but I find this provision in the act:

Sec. 10. That as soon as practicable after the said exhibition shall have been

SEC. 10. That, as soon as practicable after the said exhibition shall have been closed, it shall be the duty of said corporation to convert this property into cash, and, after the payment of all its liabilities, to divide its remaining assets among its stockholders pro rata in full satisfaction and discharge of its capital stock. And it shall be the duty of the United States Centennial Commission to supervise the closing up of the affairs of said corporation; to audit its accounts, and submit, in a report to the President of the United States, the financial results of the centennial exhibition.

There is an express provision that the stockholders shall have the surplus earnings and revenues of the corporation. No wonder, then, the power to mortgage the property is not exercised! No wonder that Congress is asked to give a million and a half of dollars! It is easy to force this sum from the people, and leave the surplus for the stock-

In view of the vast multitude which I trust will assemble there on that day, in view of the vast advantages which this corporation posthat day, in view of the vast advantages which this corporation possesses and shall possess in taxing visitors in a variety of ways, it may be, and it will be, that they will realize vast sums of money. How great the profits will be, I take it, no one to-day can estimate. How much they are to be advantaged by it, no one can tell; but whether they are or not, if this was simply a patriotic movement, if we looked simply to having the hundredth natal day of the nation properly celebrated before the world why was it not varyided in the acts of incorporation properly celebrated before the world why was it not varyided in the acts of incorporation possesses and shall be a supposed to the provide and the property of the provided in the acts of incorporation possesses and shall possess in a variety of ways, it not world the provided in the acts of the provided in the acts of incorporation possesses and shall possess in a variety of ways, it not warried to the provided in the acts of the provided particles and the provided provided in the acts of the provided particles are the profits with the provided provided particles and the provided particles are the provided particles and the provided particles are the provided particle brated before the world, why was it not provided in the acts of incorporation, and why not embrace such a provision in the bill now be-fore the Senate—a provision that any surplus realized shall be devoted to the completion of the Washington Monument in this city, which stands there to-day in some measure a disgrace to the American people, because it is not completed, as it ought to have been long ago? I say to the friends of this bill again that if I could be convinced there was an actual necessity for this appropriation, that there was even a reasonable demand for it, I should not withhold my vote for one moment. On the contrary, I would cheerfully yield it, for, as I said in the outset, my natural impulses lead me to favor any measure looking to the due celebration of that great day in memory of the great men and the noble and ever-memorable deeds they did, who secured the blessings of the established freedom which I and my fei-low-countrymen everywhere enjoy this day. Their names and their deeds are immortal; they merit the unbounded love and reverence of their descendants to the latest posterity, and I confidently trust their memories will be and remain forever fresh in the American heart

My opposition to the bill goes on the ground that the money needed ought to be the free offering of the people, and the absence of any reasonable necessity for demanding the appropriation. I put it on reasonable necessity for demanding the appropriation. I put it on these grounds, and on these grounds exclusively. I thought at one time I might be induced to vote for the bill, but since I have failed to get from the honorable chairman of the committee who reported it, and who, I suppose, is in possession of all the information that could be laid before the committee on this subject-when I have failed to get from the advocates of this bill any information going to satisfy my mind and judgment of the necessity of this appropriation, I cannot hesitate about my vote; and though I may seemingly oppose a measure looking to a patriotic end, I do not do so in truth and fact and for the reasons I have stated. Some Senator suggested that the hard time had prevented the converted for the residue of the second residue of the seco for the reasons I have stated. Some Senator suggested that the hard times had prevented the corporation from raising as much money as they anticipated, and therefore the application to Congress. Then if the people are so distressed that they cannot contribute voluntarily, shall we force them to do so by a statute? I trust not.

I thought, Mr. President, it was due that I should state thus briefly and hurriedly my reasons for voting against the bill before us. They are such as control my judgment and vote, and I believe they will commend themselves to disinterested people everywhere.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I had not intended to address the Senate on this bill, and should have been content simply to cast my vote for it, but this morning I received the newspapers from Wilmington, North Carolina, containing the account of a patriotic meeting of the citizens of Pender County and the people of the Cape Fear mington, North Carolina, containing the account of a patriotic meeting of the citizens of Pender County and the people of the Cape Fear country, for the purpose of commemorating the centennial anniversary of the battle of Moore's Creek, which occurred in that county on the 27th day of February, 1776, before the Declaration at Philadelphia. The resolutions of that meeting represent so truly and eloquently the sentiment of the people of North Carolina and of the whole South that I have felt it to be my duty to lay them before the Senate and the country. Senate and the country.

I ask the Clerk to read the resolution which I send to the desk. would have all of the proceedings read, but the resolution indicated is most pertinent to the question before us, and I know, at this very late hour, how impatient Senators must be.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the results of the late war have not abated one jot or tittle of our devotion to the principles of the Constitution upon which the Government is founded; and although the issues at stake were decided adversely to our hopes and expectations, yet being settled, there exists no reason why we should not love the Government which our fathers aided in establishing, and the old flag which they honored and loved, with as much ardor and faith as do the citizens of any section of our common country; and that we consider it a patriotic duty, not alone to cherish affection for the Government, but to teach our children to love it.

Mr. RANSOM. I need not remind you, Mr. President, that the battle of Moore's Creek was one of the most interesting of the Revolution, and that the great victory gained there by the patriots gave a decided impulse to our arms; and I must in this place declare my gratification that the worthy children of the noble heroes of that field propose to honor their ancestors and to honor themselves by an appropriate celebration of its hundredth anniversary. Sir, I send them from this Chamber our heartiest sympathies. But, Mr. President, that the Senate may comprehend and fully appreciate the resolution which has just been read, I beg to say that the county of Pender, once a part of New Hanover, in which this meeting was held, has been established since the civil war, and was named in honor of General Pender, a gallant and distinguished confederate soldier who fell at Gettysburgh; that the people of the Cape Fear country, in which this new county lies, were not only distinguished during the war for independence for their gallantry and patriotism, but that in the entire South during the un-happy strife of the States no people were more devoted to the confederate cause.

The resolutions were drawn and presented by Dr. S. S. Satchwell, surgeon in the southern army from the beginning to the end of the war; a gentleman of great intelligence, of eminent position in the medical profession, and of universally admitted scientific attainment and distinction. Among the many persons who were present at the meeting I see the names of the representative men of that section of our State—gentlemen of substance, of character, of high social and political influence, and I also notice that it is contemplated that that entire section of our State, embracing many counties and thousands of people, is to join in the celebration. I mention and call attention, Mr. President, to these circumstances, that it may be known that the sentiments expressed and the spirit pervading these resolutions are the true representative opinions and feelings of the people of North Carolina and the South, and as such I present them to the Senate and to the country.

I have before declared on this floor that as an American Senator I had one object constantly before me which rose above all others, and to which no other consideration except the honor of my country approached, and that object was the reconciliation of the North and the south, and the restoration of all our people of both sections to the Union of our fathers. Before my eyes and in my breast this aspiration and purpose have been and will be sacredly and fervently kept, and the benignant Providence that holds the destinies of this country can confer upon me no greater blessing than to make me one of the humble instruments in again bringing together and uniting as friends and

In this light, Mr. President, the centennial anniversary at Philadelphia has been to me a subject of the deepest interest; and when I have reflected upon the wonderful mercies of a beneficent Providence to the American people since they first left the shores of the Old World and made their home on this continent up to this hour, it has seemed to me almost a divine interposition that this centennial reunion should so soon follow the bloody years of war, to obliterate its memories and to bring back associations of patriotism, of joy, and of gratitude, in which every American citizen could join upon a common and fraternal ground. I have often observed that the sweet heavens soon pour their kind rains upon the field of carnage, as if to wash out the signs of the bloody struggle, and I have more than hoped that in the great coming-together at Philadelphia the memories of a common ancestry, the glories of a united history, all the duties of patriotism, and all the hopes of humanity would combine to remove from all our hearts every bitter trace of the ensangnined strife through which we have passed. It is not profane to say that the hand of that beneficent Providence which has always guided us as a people would be in such a scene with such a consummation.

And just here, Mr. President, seeing before me some distinguished sons of Virginia, I am reminded of that never-to-be-forgotten incident which occurred over one hundred years ago in the first Congress of the American patriots at Philadelphia. When a suggestion was made calculated to excite State jealousy and incite division, Patrick Henry, than whom no man ever was more jealous of State rights, sprang to his feet and with intense feeling declared, "I am not a Virginian but an American." That was the sentiment of the great Virginian in the an American. That was the sentiment of the great virginian in the presence of this danger of division to his country; and now at the end of a hundred years, in presence of the evils and calamities of which that same jealous spirit of division was the fountain, and in the hope that we will end and destroy that peril forever, may we not say in the spirit of Henry that on this question, and for the peace and perpetuity of that Union which from that hour was established, "We are not Virginians or Carolinians, but we are Americans?" If, sir, that sentiment and that expression was patriotic and just when the Union was beginning to be formed, it is not less patriotic and just upon an occasion when the efforts of all good men are to be made to restore that Union with all its beauty and virtue to the affections of

I heard with great pleasure my distinguished colleague declare that he had no doubt that this appropriation was strictly constitutional. On that point, Mr. President, I have had no trouble. If I had serious doubts that this bill was constitutional, if I could discover in its provisions the slightest violation of the Constitution, of course I could not support it. When I read the Constitution in the light of eighty-six years, when I run down the line of precedents for nearly a century, beginning with the very foundation of the Government and continuing in unbroken succession to this hour, and behold this character of power constantly and almost invariably exercised, I find myself almost without capacity to argue such a question. Sir, can the first and highest duty of the people, regard, affection, gratitude, justice to the founders of their liberties, be unconstitutional? Can this great Government, with its forty millions of people, enact and achieve every other work of beneficence and still be without the capacity to render proper respect to the men and the events to whom it mainly owes its existence? Can it, in its just benignity and duty, bestow pensions on the revolutionary soldiers and be denied the holy privilege of honoring the signers of the great Declaration? Can it send expeditions of science and humanity to the polar seas, load ships of charity for noble but suffering peoples, take care of Indian savages, and go to the uttermost limits of the earth in pursuit of its humane and national functions, and yet cannot expend one dollar to testify its admiration for the virtues of the the authors of our liberty? Sir, I find myself at a loss to argue such a proposition. What State of the Union does this bill involve? Whose liberty does it strike down? What muniment of property or life does it endanger?

Last night I read for my instruction (and if I had time I would read it now to the Senate) the history of that great event. I saw be-fore me the actors in that sublime drama: Hancock and Adams, and Jefferson and Carroll, and Hewes and Hooper and Caswell of my own State. I thought of Mecklenburgh and Philadelphia, Lexington and Yorktown. I thought of the great deed and of what that deed had done and would do for the world in all time to come. And I thought, if some malignant being had entered that assembly and said: "You may perform this immortal deed; you may put your hands and scals to the 'declaration;' you may proclaim it at the head of the Army, publish it to the world, accomplish its grand purposes, and bless all mankind with your achievement; but one hundred years from now, on the return of this day, your very children will hesitate to acknowledge their obligations to you and will decline to honor your God-like act," what would have been their indignant incredulity? Senators, this grand Government of ours, with its precious liberties, for which our fathers poured out their noble blood and their poor treasure like rain-water, must not be indifferent to their memories.

But, sir, we are told that the country is in financial distress and we have been reminded that the people of the South are poor. I hope that our recommendations are the country in the country will be so that the country that the country will be so that the country that the country will be so that the country that the country that the country will be so that the country that t that our economy will begin in other quarters. I respect the spirit of economy; it is one of the greatest virtues of a republic; but let it be exercised on proper occasions and for proper purposes. respect for that professed economy which grows exacting when sacred duties are to be discharged. I have no respect for the economy which in the son hesitates to erect a tombstone to his father. I have no respect for the economy which in the daughter declines to strew flowers on the grave of her mother. Sir, we are moral beings; we have sentiments, emotions, affections; we are not altogether material; and that government which does not cultivate and foster the exalted sentiments of patriotism, duty, gratitude, and love of the good in all its forms, will soon be a curse to its citizens. These virtues are worth more than all the gold in California.

It is, sir, because many of our people are poor that I desire to see this bill pass; that I desire to see the Government which represents every human being within the country contribute to this celebraevery human being within the country contribute to this celebra-tion. For one, I am unwilling that the fortunate and wealthy alone should discharge this great duty. I wish every one of us, every citizen in the United States, to have his part in this noble work, to have his share in the glory of this deed. I wish every American, as he beholds that illustrious day, as he treads that proud ground, whether he be rich or poor, from the North or the South, to feel that it is the hundredth anniversary of his country's birthday, and that he has given to it from his own means and his own patriotism. that day I wish to see in the face of every American citizen the image of "American Independence."

It is true, Mr. President, that at the South we are poor, very poor. I regret our poverty; but, sir, it will not affect our honor and our duty here that we are poor. If the South had the wealth she once enjoyed, to contribute her portion to the centennial would be but a trifle. We should not feel it or miss it. But, sir, I desire to see the South—poor as she is, wasted, desolated, stricken, and with all her great, proud sorrows at her door, still unbroken and unshaken in her devotion to the principles she declared one hundred years ago, and with nothing left her but her virtues—coming up to that great day, and then and there declaring her unchangeable love of liberty and fidelity to constitutional government. Sir, around her on that day and at that place memories will cluster that will make the South brighter than if she was adorned with diamonds. No, sir; in our distress, amid our ruin, under our sorrows, let us stand up and declare to the people of the North that for liberty-the liberty our fathers -for good government, constitutional government, we can forget and forgive what we have conceived to be our wrongs, and we cannot see why they cannot meet us and unite with us as our fathers and their fathers united.

I confess, sir, that the allusions made by the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that the venerable patriots of the South who had been soldiers in the war of 1812 had been stricken from the pension-rolls, and to the further fact that there were still some seven hundred persons in the South who had not received amnesty, quite touched me. I have reflected deeply and sadly on that subject. I have no words to express my sorrow, and I had almost said my shame, that this great Government should longer suffer this reproach on her justice and magnanimity. should longer suffer this reproach on her justice and magnanimity. But, Mr. President, as a patriot, as an American Senator representing a patriotic and a great Strte, I must not and I cannot permit a suggestion of this character to divert me from my duty. I will do right; I will ask my State to do right; I will appeal to the South to do right; and I will leave the consequences to the wisdom, justice, and patriotism of the American people. I desire to see the Union restored in all its beneficence and harmony. I cherish the honor and the glory of my State and the South, and I will not by a hair's-breadth impair the Union representations. Union or by one shadow dim the character of the South by taking counsel of our passions or prejudices, and certainly not by following the bad example I so deeply condem and deplore.

But, Senators, as I before said, my great purpose in voting for this bill is to do everything in my power to reconcile our people and to restore and perpetuate the Union. I desire the patriotic men of both sections to meet together at Philadelphia, to recur to the great event that brought our fathers together, and then, looking together over the last hundred years, to learn again the lesson of American patriots.

I desired the people of the whole Union to see and to know that those of us who had taken up arms against the Government had now laid them down forever, and that we had come back with our hearts to the Union and its flag, and were determined to live by it and to die for it, and that we claimed and asked nothing but equal rights, equal honors, equal duties under the Constitution and in the Union of our fathers. To that great centennial we proposed to bring the images of the patriots, statesmen, and heroes who contributed so much to our independence and the establishment of this Government; we proposed to bring the history of eighty years of undivided devotion to posed to bring the history of eighty years of undivided devotion to the Union, its laws, and its good name; and then we proposed, on the altars where our fathers first sanctified the Union, to extinguish the last flame of discord. As Philadelphia on the 4th day of July, 1776, was the birthplace of our National Independence, so we devoutly desired to see it made on the 4th day of July, 1876, the sepulcher of our sectional animosities. The century has completed its great circle, and though the vast circumference has been once broken by discord, we desired to see it end where it began, in ardent devotion to liberty, in undiminished patriotism, in Christian humanity, and in renewed and ever strengthening and continuing bonds of union.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will now be on the preamble. Will the Senate order the third reading of the preamble?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that I care to divide the Senate or do more than express my own opposition to the preamble. That was why I asked the question to be divided. It does not state the facts as they are and as almost everybody knows them to be. Therefore I shall vote against it, but I do not care about calling for the yeas and now myself as we stoteward is enough to show are neverties. and nays myself, as my statement is enough to show my opposition

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the question be taken separately again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be taken, first, on the body of the bill, and then on the preamble. The question is on the passage of the body of the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have no speech to make on this bill. I wish simply to say that with the view I entertain of the Constitution, and which I expressed at a former session when a bill asking for an appropriation for this exhibition was before the Senate, I cannot vote for the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understood that the preamble was adopted without a division.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was ordered to be read a third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That vote was on the third reading.

The question now is on the passage of the bill without the preamble.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Idesire, Mr. President, to simply say that I cannot vote for this bill. It is too late to assign the reasons for the vote which I shall give. If I could have obtained the floor at an earlier period of the session I introduced to express my consection to the bill both on I shall give. If I could have obtained the floor at an earlier period of the session I intended to express my opposition to the bill both on constitutional grounds and as a question of expediency and propriety. It is now near five o'clock, entirely too late to enter into any argument in reference to this measure; but I cannot permit the remarks which fell from the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] to pass without expressing my dissent. If I understood him aright he said that in the consideration of this bill we should not pause at the Constitution of the country. Sir, it is that sentiment that has brought upon us much of the trouble which this country now experiences and we ought not by any vote of ours to encourage the experiences, and we ought not by any vote of ours to encourage the utterance of such sentiments or to encourage them in the practice of the Senate. Sir, it is only by a strict adherence to the principles of the Constitution that we can bring back this Government to the plain the Constitution that we can bring back this Government to the plain republican system of government that it was intended to be by the framers of that instrument. Let us pause when a question of constitutional power is concerned. I remember reading in my profession the utterance of a distinguished English judge when a question came before him involving millions to the exchequer of England, that however much he should regret to see the exchequer of the country affected by the decision, yet, sitting as a judge to determine the question presented to him, he would not pause to consider the effect upon the exchequer of England, but that he would decide the question according to the very right of the matter and the law of the land. So, sir, here as Senators, when a question of this kind is presented before us, looking to the fact that we have no power and can exercise no power except what is expressly granted in the Constitution of the country or arises out of it by necessary implication, shall we be told in the language of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina that we are not to pause at the Constitution in considering a question of this kind? Sir, if that sentiment prevails, farewell not only to the liberties of this country, but to the prosperity of this country; and I think I found the echo of that sentiment in something which fell from the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAPERTON] when he

Sir, is that the teaching of the fathers of this Republic, that the money of the people should be taken by taxation and applied to subsidizing corporations? I speak not in any reproachful terms of these corporations because they are corporations. When I use the term "corporation," I do not mean it in any offensive sense. I believe that the object proposed by this corporation is a commendable object, and I sympathize heartily with the object which the corporation proposes in celebrating the anniversary of our independence. Sir, I yield to no man in my devotion to the institutions of the country; I yield to no man in attachment to the principles secured by our revolutionary fathers; but I pause to do anything outside of the Constitution; and when the Constitution inhibits an action, so help me God, no vote of mine shall ever be given for what it inhibits. Sir, I should like, if there were time for me to enter into an explanation of my views as to the power in the Constitution which is claimed to warrant this appropriation, the power to provide for the general welfare. That is a vague, uncertain, undefined, fugitive power, lodged somewhere, according to gentlemen here; but according to my reading of the Constitution that is simply a power granted to Congress to lay and collect taxes, &c., "in order," in the language of Judge Story, "to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare. It is an authority to promote the general welfare by exercising the powers delegated to Congress in the Constitution, not outside of the Constitution. That is the true interpretation of it, that when Congress shall provide for the common defense and the general welfare, they shall do it by the exercise of the delegated powers contained in the Constitution and granted to Congress.

But, Mr. President, I did not intend to say even this much. I regret exceedingly that on this question I am not able to agree with gentleexceedingly that on this question I am not able to agree with gentlemen for whose opinions and judgment I have the very highest regard and respect; and I would not now have offered a single sentiment except in explanation of the vote I shall give. I cannot find in the Constitution of the country a sufficient warrant for this appropriation; nor do I believe that it is right and proper in view of the present existing circumstances of the country. Why, sir, the very last year you had between seven and eight thousand cases of adjudicated bankruptcy in this country; and all over this land, in the language of the Senator from Mississippi, "there is the cry of the poor and the desolate, the needy and the distressed." There are hundreds and thousands of men to-day trembling on the very verge of bankruptcy, while there are hundreds of thousands who have not the common necessaries of life; and yet the taxes wrung from the people are to be taken by this life; and yet the taxes wrung from the people are to be taken by this bill and appropriated to a celebration in Philadelphia.

I cannot, therefore, either on the ground of constitutional power or because I believe it is expedient or proper, vote for this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the body of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Cooper, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Howe, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Merrimon, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Whyte, and Withers—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bogy, Booth, Bruce. Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cockrell, Davis, English, Gordon, Johnston, Norwood, Saulsbury, Sherman, West, and Wright—16.

So the bill was passed.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask to be excused from serving upon the committee of conference on House joint resolution No. 52, which, I understand, will want to hold a session very soon, and it is probable I shall be absent for a few days, so that I cannot attend. I expect to be absent to-morrow and possibly until Monday. I therefore ask to be

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 11, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

CHARLES H. FONDÉ.

The SPEAKER. Before the regular order proceeds, the Chair desires to make a request of the House in reference to the bill for the relief of Charles H. Fondé, which was reported from the Committee on Patents and was under consideration at the close of the morning hour on last Friday. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Conger] informs the Chair that he made an earnest effort at that time to secure the entry of a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the engrossment and third reading of the bill. That motion is not entered in the RECORD or the Journal, and it was not heard by the Chair; but, notwithstanding this fact, the Chair desires that the friends of this bill shall have whatever benefit might result from the appropriate entry of the motion to reconsider at that time. The Chair therefore asks the House that it shall now be regarded as having been entered in proper form and time, so that it may be called up hereafter upor the pleasure of the parties interested.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I think the bill had better be referred simply to the Committee of the Whole, where there is free opportunity for discussion. I ask that by general consent it be so referred and placed on the Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. My recollection is different from that of the gentleman from Michigan, and still more in aid of him. When the morning hour expired a gentleman upon our left here, whose name I do not remember, was making a very loud and earnest whose name I do not remember, was making a very call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. For tellers.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Was it for tellers? Well, at any rate it was a proposition relative to some more advanced stage of proceeding. I do not think the bill is in such a situation as to need a reconsider: I believe it is still before the House. I deem it fair to make this statement, although I am opposed to the bill and spoke against it the other day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is compelled to say that, if the point of order is pressed, he will have to rule that the demand for tellers cannot now be availed of; that it is too late.

Mr. RANDALL. I think I can solve this difficulty by asking unanimous consent that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Patents.

The SPEAKER. That is the better mode of proceeding.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the committee, when again called, can report the bill in a modified form.

Mr. CONGER. Perhaps it is due to myself to say that in the misunderstanding between the Chair and the gentleman who tried to make the call for tellers, and in the attending confusion, other business intervened; and although the gentleman who then occupied the chair stated that the bill would be the first business in the morning hour on the next Friday, yet I felt satisfied, from the lapse of time be-fore the recognition of the call for tellers, that the Speaker would be obliged to hold that it was not to-day the regular order to divide on that question. As I had no opportunity then, while coming to that conclusion, to enter my motion to reconsider, therefore on the next Monday (this was on Friday and there was no session of the House on Saturday) I wrote a special notice of a motion to reconsider and filed it with the Clerk.

Mr. RANDALL. That was within the two days.

Mr. CONGER. That was within the two days. But it was not entered on the Journal, and therefore there is no record of it. Now, I do not care what the process may be. I would agree to the suggestion that by unanimous consent the bill be referred to the Committee on Patents with the privilege of reporting it on their regular call.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition that the bill be recommitted with leave to the committee to report it hereafter upon their regular call?

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

CORRECTION OF A VOTE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am recorded in the Journal and the RECORD as not having voted the day before yesterday upon House bill No. 192, relating to the public lands at Vincennes. I voted "no."

CENTENNIAL AUTOGRAPH REGISTERS.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) concerning the centennial autograph registers of F. B. Taylor and E. W. Bixby; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration, and ordered to be printed.

EASTERN BAND OF CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1987) to authorize the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians to institute suits, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ROOM FOR COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Patents to report to the House a resolution to provide a room for the Committee on Patents, which I ask be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not order that reference unless the gentleman from North Carolina desires to take the sense of the House on the motion. The resolution properly goes to the Committee

Mr. BLAINE. I object.
Mr. CONGER. I think, on a question of privilege, the gentleman submitting the resolution should have the right to indicate its reference. I desire to say in behalf of the Committee on Patents in regard to this resolution that the extent and importance of the business befor that committee, requiring subcommittees to meet every day, entitle it to be assigned some place in this Capitol where they can meet without interruption. These subcommittees are now compelled to meet in rooms where other committees have priority. If there be any use at all in having such a committee, it is proper they should have a place where they can properly do their work. The object, therefore, of this resolution is to have some authority in this House designate a place where the Committee on Patents may meet to perform its business. If there be no such place assigned, perhaps it would be better that the committee was abolished.

Mr. BLAINE. My object in objecting was in no way to deprive the committee of a room, but I remembered that a few days since, on the request of the Speaker himself, the whole question of the disposition of committee rooms was given to the Committee of Accounts. And the Committee on Rules does not wish to take it away from that committee or to divert it in any way whatever. That is the ground of my objection.

The SPEAKER. In addition to the fact that the House has already ordered that the regulation and disposition of committee-rooms shall be referred to the Committee of Accounts, the Chair desires to say that now at this late day, after so many assignments have been made by that committee, to refer this whole matter to another committee must of necessity involve a needless amount of unpleasant collision and trouble.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the reason for referring the resolution to the Committee on Rules is that it involves the question who has the right of dispossessing one committee and placing another committee in their room. It is eminently proper that the ong another committee in their room. It is eminently proper that the Committee on Rules should have charge of that matter. I understand the whole subject was referred to the Committee of Accounts, but they have never made any report to the House. We are placed in a very embarrassing situation. We have not only no committee-room which we can call our own, but we cannot control the drawers in the tables. Our subcommittees, rendered necessary for the prompt discharge of the vast amount of business referred by the House to us, have no place to meet. Yet every day there is necessity for the meeting of some one or other subcommittee of the Committee on Patents. The public business cannot of course be discharged unless we have such committee-room. We will be content with any room assigned to us which is proper and suitable for the meeting of the committees. We ought to have a room where our models may be in safe-keeping under our own control. We have no such place. We have no place under our own control. We have no such place. We have no place which we can call our own at the present time.

Mr. HOSKINS. Let me say one word. I see by looking toward the desk of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] chairman of the Committee of Accounts, that he is not in his seat. Were he present I would not say a word. This whole subject has, by order of the House, been referred to the Committee of Accounts, of which I am a member, and I desire to say that that committee have endeavored to discharge the duty confided to them to the best of their ability. The truth is there are twice as many committees as there are committee. truth is, there are twice as many committees as there are committee-rooms, so that it is impossible to give to each committee of the House a separate room. The question of what room shall be occupied by the Committee on Patents has been before the Committee of Accounts, and the chairman of that committee has been specially delegated to arrange the matter so that it shall be satisfactory to that committee. He has endeavored to do it. I can say, in relation to the pending resolution, that, if this resolution be adopted and this particular matter be taken from the Committee of Accounts, I shall then, so far as I myself am concerned, move that the Committee of Accounts be discharged from the further consideration of the whole question. The Committee on Patents will receive such attention at the hands of the Committee of Accounts as it is possible to give. We will do the very best thing possible, considering the number of committees to be served and the few rooms available for that purpose.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I should like to say it is utterly impossible for the subcommittee of the Committee on Patents, of which I am a member, to properly discharge our duty unless we have some separate room. No longer than yesterday the committee was driven from the room we were then occupying—that of the Committee on Railways and Canals; and when we went to another room we were again interrupted by gentlemen coming in. The day before yesterday the same thing occurred, so that that committee cannot transactneessary business un-less we have a room over which we can have control. I hope the committee to whom this resolution may be referred will take the matter into consideration and come to some conclusion upon it that will be satisfactory.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say one word further in regard to this matter. The old room of the Committee on Patents, a very suitable room, on which the name of that committee has been painted for years, as are the names of other committees on all other committee-rooms, has been taken from that committee by some process and they have now, as has been said, no place where they can meet. Whatever the opinion of the House may be as to the necessity of such a committee or its bringing any matter to the consideration of the House, yet I presume it will not be denied that all the classes of people interested in the matters referred to them have a right to be heard, whatever the House may determine in regard to their applications. The room now assigned to the Committee on Patents is dark and entirely unfitted for the examination of drawings, models, and manuscripts which that committee must make if they attend to their business properly.

Again, we are required continually to send to the Patent Office for the models in possession of the Government for examination, and the Patent Office will not permit those models to be taken to any room to remain there for examination unless it can be closed against the public, which cannot be done under the present arrangement. Now, I speak of this, not that I care what room the committee occupy, but from my knowledge of its business. Having served as chairman of the committee in the last Congress, I say to the Speaker and to the House that it is utterly impossible in the room assigned to us to do our business properly.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, as one of the humblest members of the Committee of Accounts I will say to my friend from Michigan, who has just taken his seat, that in my judgment the remarks he has made here would have been very properly made before the Committee of Accounts; and I believe, counting myself out entirely, that the Committee of Accounts is better prepared to determine what committee-room should be occupied by the Committee on Patents than this House is. I say that more particularly with reference to the chairman of the Committee of Accounts; and I say to this House, that if every member here would endeavor to do his duty as well as that gentleman en-

Now the trouble is, Mr. Speaker, that the Capitol needs to be enlarged. It is too small for the members of this House and the very important committees that have been appointed to investigate matters of great public concern. I do not see how it is possible that every committee of this House are horse a committee. mittee of this House can have a committee-room separately to themselves unless there be as many committee-rooms as there are commit-tees. And I have yet to find, Mr. Speaker, a single committee come before the Committee of Accounts and admit that they are second in before the Committee of Accounts and admit that they are second in point of importance to any other committee. Every single one of them has business that requires its sessions to be held all the time every day; and most of them think they ought to have a room where they can meet in private and in secret. I do not complain of this, but the difficulty is with the Capitol, with the building, or with the architect who constructed this building, in not making plenty of committee-rooms, and all of them light, airy, and convenient.

I see that the worthy chairman of the Committee of Accounts is now present. He was not in the House when I took the floor. The now present. He was not in the House when I took the floor. The Committee of Accounts have done and will do their very best to accommodate all the committees, but I do not know of any other way in which it can be done than by providing for an extension of this building or forest time.

building or for renting rooms outside.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I would like to hear the resolution read.

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is to refer to the Committee on Rules the resolution which the Clerk will again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. When the duty was imposed on the Committee of Accounts to assign rooms to the different committees, we found on the door of the committee-room occupied by the Committee on Patents the name of another committee marked for that room. We supposed that had been done by order of the Speaker. Consequently we took no control of that, but hoped that in so far as the committee-rooms had been assigned the arrangement was satis-factory. We consulted with the various committees as much as we could in order to give satisfaction, and where we could not get the gentlemen of one committee to agree to take in another committee with them, in some cases, but very few, we assigned them rooms con-trary to the wish of other committees. But we have taken no action in relation to the Committee on Patents and another committee which we found occupying the same room at the time when the duty was assigned by the House to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move to amend the motion so as to refer the resolution to the Committee of Accounts instead of the Committee

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. In reply to my friend from Indiana, I wish to say that a proposition was first made to the Committee on Patents that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads should come into the room occupied by the Committee on Patents and have joint occupancy. This was not objected to. It was afterward proposed that the Committee on Patents should surrender their room The committee was called together to consider that proposition, and it was objected to. The Committee on Invalid Pensions were notified not to occupy the room, because it was against the will and wish of the Committee on Patents. But when you, Mr. Speaker, referred this matter by consent to the Committee of Accounts, I appeared before the Committee of Accounts in behalf of the Committee on Patents and stated the wants of our committee of Accounts never reported. It was not the fault of the Committee on Patents that a notice was put up on the door of their own room that the Committee on Invalid Pensions met there. Neither was it the fault of the Committee on Patents that a similar notice was put up on the door of the room of the Committee on Railways and Canals that the Committee on Patents should meet there. That was against the will and the wish and against the protest of the committee. I think we ought to go back to our old room. The question is, Who that really the right to dispossess us of our old room and place another committee in possession of it? We are willing to do what is right under the circumstances. We desire a room; we desire to have a place where we can have kept the models required by the committee for their examination; we desire to have drawers in which to tee for their examination; we desire to have drawers in which to preserve our papers. At present we have none of these things, and we consider them essential to the proper transaction of the public business with which we are charged.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. In answer to what the gentleman has said, I will say that we submitted the matter to the three committees interested. We proposed that they should make satisfactory arrangements by changing about, removing from one room to another, as they pleased. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, [Mr. Jenks,] occupied one of the lower committee-rooms. We said to the committee in the upper room that if they could make an arrangement with the Pension Committee it would be satisfactory to the Committee of Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to receiving the resolution and referring it to the Committee of Accounts?

Mr. CONGER. I must object to that reference, because, as I understand, that committee has informed us that they propose to make no change. I therefore repeat what I said before, the Committee on no change. I therefore repeat what I said before, the Committee on Patents should have a place in which to do its business or else should be discharged. I do not know by what right a committee takes pos-session of the room which from time immemorial has been assigned to another committee, at least without an order of the House. I think it cannot be assigned under the rules. The rules of this House give to the Speaker the right to control unoccupied or unassigned committee-rooms; that is the extent of the rule. There is no power, except the mere power of might, that will authorize one committee to take possession of the room of another—no power that I know of or ever have heard of without an order of the House.

I suppose that our committee could regain possession of their room. I venture to say that we could do so if that was the desirable way of certified the matter. settling the matter. But we would rather that this House should assign us our proper room. It was because the Committee of Accounts, as we understood it, refused to make any change in the present arrangements, that our committee instructed its chairman to bring the subject to the attention of the House, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules, in order that that committee might determine what was the rule in regard to the right of committees to the possession of rooms which from time immemorial have been assigned to them, and the names of which committees have been made fixtures on the doors of those rooms. These changes of which we complain had been made by means of pasteboards or cards. Some gentleman has come along with a ten-spot and taken our nine, because it was the higher card. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. There being objection, the resolution is not before the House.

BARRACKS AT FORT MONROE.

Mr. TERRY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War transmitting plans for the erection of new barracks at Fort Monroe, Virginia, and asking an appropriation therefor, to report the same back with a favorable recommendation, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty minutes to one o'clock. This being Friday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. ROBERTS. The Committee of Accounts, to whom was referred a resolution allowing a clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it back with a substitute, and to recommend that the substitute be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The original resolution and the substitute will

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be allowed a clerk, at a salary to be fixed by the Committee of Accounts.

The substitute reported from the committee was read, as follows:

Resolved. That there be allowed to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department and also to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice each a clerk for the term of one month, to be paid each the sum of $4 per day.

The substitute was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

REVISED STATUTES FOR REPORTERS OF DEBATES.

Mr. FORT, from the Committee of Accounts, reported back, with a recommendation that the same be adopted, the following resolution: Resolved, That the Clerk of the House furnish each of the Official Reporters of the House one copy of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The resolution was adopted.

T. J. NEWBER.

Mr. McMAHON, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 547) for the relief of T. J. Newber; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee

The motion was agreed to.

HERMANN KREISMAN.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1988) for the relief of Hermann Kreisman, late consular agent at Berlin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. H. JONES.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 123) for the relief of J. H. Jones; and the same was laid on the table.

HEIRS OF JOHN S. CLARK.

Mr. TARBOX, from the same committee, reported adversely on the memorial of the widow and heirs at law of John S. Clark, deceased, late of Vincennes, Indiana, praying compensation for services performed in the transportation of the mails; and the same was laid on the table.

THOMAS VAN DUZEN.

Mr. AINSWORTH, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1026) for the relief of Thomas Van Duzen and his assigns for lands; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROSETTA HERT ET AL.

Mr. HOOKER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 534) for the relief of Rosetta Hert, (late Rosetta Scoville,) Charles C. Benoist, Emily Benoist, and Logan Fanfan, half-breed Indians; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SURETIES OF INDIAN AGENTS

Mr. SCALES, from the same committee, reported a bill to amend section 10 of the act making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. SCALES. This is an act to amend a bill passed at the last session of Congress in reference to the agencies then existing in the Indian Department. This bill is a mere amendment, intended to apply that law to all the agents; that law only applied to agents then in exist-ence at that time. The bill comes from the Secretary of the Interior, and I hope it will be passed. The bill was read in part.

During the reading,
Mr. FORT said: That is no doubt a very good bill, but it is not in order, and I suggest whether it is worth while to have it read further

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SCALES. It comes from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. It is a public bill, and there is a call for reports of a private nature.

Mr. FORT. I do not wish to oppose the bill, but it is not a private bill.

TREATY WITH THE POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

Mr. VAN VORHES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 157) to carry into effect the tenth article of the treaty with the Pottawatomie Indians of February 27, 1867, accompanied by a written report, and moved that the report be printed, and that the bill and report be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

SHARP & SHAW.

Mr. PAGE, from the same committee, reported adversely on the memorial and papers relating to the claim of Messrs. Sharp & Shaw, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM STEVENS.

Mr. KETCHUM, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 719) for the relief of the heirs of William Stevens; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ARMY OFFICER'S RECORD.

Mr. TERRY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1317) to amend an Army officer's record; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

W. C. SPENCER.

Mr. TERRY also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the memorial of W. C. Spencer, making application for re-instatement in the Army, to be placed either on the active or the retired list of captains; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHARLES D. C. WILLIAMS.

Mr. TERRY also, from the same committee, reported back adversely papers relating to the claim of Charles D. C. Williams, late a captain of marine artillery; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FORT BUTLER MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. TERRY. The bill (H. R. No. 350) to release the Fort Butler Mr. TERRY. The bill (H. R. No. 350) to release the Fort Butler military reservation was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. We find that the Secretary of War thinks the reservation is no longer needed for military purposes; but as the reservation is claimed by the heirs of the grantee the committee think it appropriate that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. I move, therefore, that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN NEWS.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 64) granting the rights and benefits of the Soldiers' Home to John News; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. C. THRUSH AND WILLIAM B. STONE.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 732) for the relief of Mrs. Catharine Thrush and William B. Stone, owners of the schooner Flight; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CIVIL ENGINEERS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. MILLS, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1164) fixing the rank and pay of civil engineers in the Navy; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MEDICAL AND PAY DIRECTORS.

Mr. MILLS also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1091) to amend section 1588 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the pay of medical and pay directors; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ISAIAH DEWLING.

Mr. MILLS also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the memorial of Isaiah Dewling; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROBERT BURTON RODNEY.

Mr. BURLEIGH, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 417) for the transfer of paymaster Robert Burton Rodney from the retired list to the active list of the Navy; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed. CREW OF THE UNITED STATES STEAMER COLORADO.

Mr. WILLIS, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Captain John Lee Davis, United States Navy, on behalf of the crew of the United States steamer Colorado at the time of the capture of New Orleans, in April, 1862, asking that they be allowed head and prize money; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ASSIMILATED RANK OF WARRANT OFFICERS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. LEWIS, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of 55 boatswains, 62 gunners, 50 carpenters, and 38 sailmak-rs, all warrant officers of the United States Navy, relative to the act authorizing assimilated rank to warrant officers of the Navy; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PRESENT FROM GREAT BRITAIN TO EDWIN JAMES.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 65) authorizing Edwin James, United States consular agent at San José, to accept a piece of plate from the Queen of Great Britain; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes Edwin James to accept from Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain a piece of plate which she desires to present to him in recognition of his courageous and efficient services rendered in support of J. Magee, the British vice-consul, when his life was threatened by the commandant of San José.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CONSULATES AT AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, OMOA, AND TRUXILLO.

Mr. FORNEY, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 305) to change the consulates at Aix-la-Chapelle and at Omoa and Truxillo.

The bill was read. It provides that the consulate now established at Aix-la-Chapelle, in class 5, in schedule B of consulates, be removed to Cologne, within the same consular district; and the consulate now established at Omoa and Truxillo, in class 7, in schedule C of consulates, be removed to Utila, in the Bay Islands; and that such removals shall in no manner affect the appropriations for such consulates or the existing provisions of law applicable thereto, except as modified thereby.

Mr HOLMAN. I suppose there is a report accompanying this bill;

if not, perhaps some explanatian can be made which will be satisfac-

Mr. FORNEY. It is a Senate bill and has for its object to change the consulate from Aix-la-Chapelle to Cologne, in the same consular district. No additional expense will be incurred thereby. It has been recommended by our minister to Berlin, and also by the Secretary of State. The committee are satisfied the change would be to the benefit of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will it be left in the same class?
Mr. FOENEY. Cologne is supposed to be the most prominent city.
Mr. HOLMAN. Does it raise the salary?
Mr. FORNEY. It does not; it is left in the same class.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MARY B. HOOK.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Mary B. Hook, widow of Colonel James H. Hook, United States Army, praying a pension for services rendered by him to the Government; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

CHARLES H. FORRESTALL.

Mr. JENKS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 384) for the relief of Charles H. Forrestall, late private in Company F, Second Regiment United States Sharpshooter Volunteers; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ROBERT CAVANAUGH.

Mr. RICE, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1989) granting a pension to Robert Cavanaugh; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EDWARD HEINZEL.

Mr. RICE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1990) granting a pension to Edward Heinzel; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY ANN M'DONALD.

Mr. RICE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1991) granting a pension to Mary Ann McDonald; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HARRIS B. LOVELL.

Mr. BAGBY, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 1236) granting a pension to Harris B. Lovell, late private in Company C, One hundred and twenty-second Illinois Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the acceptance in the Private Calendar, and, with the acceptance in the Private Calendar, and the private Calendar is the private Ca companying report, ordered to be printed.

JEFFERSON BOWERS

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 1588) granting an additional pension to Jefferson Bowers, of Mason County, Illinois; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES W. THOMPSON.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 1245) granting a pension to James W. Thompson, late of Company H, Forty-seventh Illinois Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. LYDIA JOHNSON.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 1499) granting a pension to Mrs. Lydia Johnson, of De Witt County, Illinois; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HARRISON MITCHELL.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 501) granting a pension to Harrison Mitchell; which was laid on the table, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY P. ABEEL.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1992) granting an additional pension to Mary P. Abeel; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, also, from the same committee, reported back, with adverse recommendations, the following petitions; and the same were severally laid on the table:

Petition for invalid pension by John Pope, late private Company K, Eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers;

Petition of Catharine Greybig, for pension on account of the loss of her husband, Philip Greybig, in the naval service of the United States during the rebellion; and Petition of William A. Henderson, praying that he be granted a

WILLIAM H. H. ANDERSON.

Mr. SINNICKSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 258) granting a pension to William H. H. Anderson; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN E. WUNDERLIN.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 183) granting an increase of pension to John E. Wunderlin, late a private in the Thirty-third Regiment of New York Volunteer Infantry; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYMENT OF COMMITTEE-CLERK.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to offer the following resolution, and ask res reference to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be allowed a clerk, at a salary of $4 per day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reference? It can only be done by unanimous consent.

There was no objection; and the resolution was referred to the Committee of Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports of a private nature has now been completed,

DUTY ON BOOKS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to have a short petition read, which I think will be interesting to the House and which I present for reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives: Your petitioners, teachers and men of letters and science, respectfully represent that the present high duty on all foreign books less than twenty years old is a tax upon knowledge of the most onerous character, which bears with especial severity upon those who are desirous of keeping themselves acquainted with the progress of letters and science abroad. At the same time your petitioners recognize the fact that the abolition of duty on all books, though eminently desirable, is not now practicable. But books in the modern foreign languages constitute a class easily distinguishable, rarely reprinted in this country, and containing the largest part of that knowledge which is sought by your petitioners. They therefore pray that books in other than the English, Latin, and Greek languages be added to the list of articles admitted through the custom-house free of duty.

H. W. Longfellow, J. R. Lowell, O. W. Holmes, Charles Francis Adams, Theodore D. Woolsey, W. C. Bryant, R. W. Emerson, George Bancroft, Francis Parkman, and six hundred professors and men of science in Harvard University, Yale College, and fifty other colleges in the United States.

The petition was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Hoskins in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The paragraph pending when the committee rose yesterday was the following:

For ministers resident at Portugal, Switzerland, Belgium, Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden and Norway, Turkey, Venezuela, and the Hawaiian Islands, at $6,500 each, $58,500.

Mr. MONROE. I offer the following amendment:

Add after the word "Venezuela" the words "Ecuador, Colombia, and Bolivia." The object of the amendment is to give each of these countries a minister by itself. Mr. RANDALL. The effect of it is to break up the consolidations which the committee recommend.

Mr. MONROE. Yes; certainly. The question being taken on Mr. Monroe's amendment, it was not

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I offer the following amendment:

Amend by striking out "$58,500" in line 21, and inserting in lieu thereof "$45,500;" and add the following paragraph:
For minister resident accredited to Denmark, Sweden and Norway, to reside at such place as the President may from time to time direct, in either of the states

The effect of that amendment is to consolidate the missions to Denmark, Sweden and Norway, and I offer it as in accordance with the remarks which I had the honor to make in reference to this bill. I there suggested the consolidation of these missions as more desirable, if consolidations are to be effected, than those of the South American missions. I am not aware certainly whether the Committee on Appropriations is disposed to accede to this amendment or not; but I have the impression that they do regard it as acceptable. I think that if the committee should conclude to accept it, it might form a practical answer to a remark which was made yesterday to me by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in a manner designed undoubtedly to be personally offensive, that there was nothing in the manner of my speech or in its substance, so far as he was concerned, which entitled me to any courtesy at his hands. I confess I was very which entitled me to any courtesy at his hands. I confess I was very much astonished and very much pained when that remark was addressed to me, and I have therefore carefully gone over the remarks which I made on this subject, to see if I gave any reasonable ground for any irritation on the part of the chairman of the committee. I have been unable to find any ground of offense. If I had, I should apologize to him and to the House. My crime seems to have been that I ventured to form an independent judgment. I desire, sir, to work with my colleague on this side of the House in favor of every just measure of reform: but the gentleman who undertakes to bring me measure of reform; but the gentleman who undertakes to bring me into line has not long enough been accustomed to command upon this floor—and I believe that his long service hitherto has been in the minority—to have that gracious manner and kindly courtesy which are desirable in order to bring gentlemen into harmony with him. So far as I am concerned, I do not propose to allow his ungracious treat-ness before the House. Now, sir, on looking over the criticisms in which the gentleman indulged upon my remarks I find that he made no sufficient answer to what I had said as to the difficulty in relation to the Chinese consulates, and when that subject comes up I shall show that his positions are untenable in regard to those consulates. He did not meet my criticism as to the abolition of our only consulate on the Black Sea, the omission as to Hayti, and the other points to which I called the attention of the committee.

But he left the subject simply with the assertion that there was nothing in the matter or substance of my remarks which commands attention. The decision of the committee as to the amendment which I propose will be a sufficient answer to this assertion.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not read the remarks of the gentleman Mr. RANDALL. I have not read the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] as they appear in the RECORD, but I heard them very distinctly; and one of them inferentially, if not directly, attributed ignorance to the Committee on Appropriations. Now that was a very unkind remark for him to make.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. There is no charge of ignorance against the committee in my speech.

Mr.RANDALL. The remarks made on this floor were that probably the Committee on Appropriations did not know where the Yang-tse-Kiang River was.

Kiang River was.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I beg to say that I read my speech word for word from the manuscript, and that it was printed from my manuscript at the RECORD office, as may be easily ascertained.

Mr. RANDALL. I heard it on the floor. Now, the remark that the committee were ignorant on that point was not true, and was very unkind, and, not being true, it was very unjustifiable. That is all I have to say upon the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment be again reported for the purpose of seeing where the language comes in.

The amendment was again read.

Hr. HOLMAN. This amendment is entirely satisfactory to the members of the Committee on Appropriations, so far as I am advised, and it seems to me a very proper amendment to be made. It comes in properly at the end of the paragraph instead of in the midst of it, inasmuch as the three countries are thrown together, and it should be made a separate paragraph. The same arrangement has been adopted in regard to other consolidated countries.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has not mentioned the fact-but of course all gentlemen have heard of it-that this consolidation is attended with no embarrassment whatever. These are friendly powers with whom we have little commerce and no political relations beyond amity and national friendship.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I suggest that the words "Denmark," "Sweden," and "Norway" should be stricken from line 19 if this amendment is to prevail.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I supposed that it had provided for that, and I accept the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood that the language of the amendment strikes out those words.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the language of the amendment: but the Clerk will modify it.

The question was taken; and the amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following amendment to come in after the word "Islands" in line 20: "and to Uruguay also accredited to Paraguay;" so that it will read:

For ministers resident at Portugal, Switzerland, Belgium, Netherlands, Turkey, Venezuela, and the Hawaiian Islands, and to Uruguay also accredited to Paraguay, at $6,500 each, $58,500.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up endless time on this bill, and if the gentleman in charge of it, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will consent to this amendment, I hope I shall not be called upon to trouble the diplomatic part of the bill any further.

The missions at Uruguay and Paraguay have already been consolidated into one. There were formerly two missions, but under a general statute the two were consolidated as one, and half the pay of either saved. Therefore at present the minister at Uruguay accredited also to Paraguay receives a salary of $10,500 a year. That salary in this bill has been struck out, and in the paragraph beginning at line 30 in the printed bill the mission to those two countries is further onsolidated with that to the Argentine Repub.ic. I do not seek here—
I state this to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL]— to put back this mission to its old salary; I think that would be too much, considering the line in which this bill is being conducted.

But I do ask that it may be put in at this reduced rate of $5,500 a year, and for this reason: There is no good reason why Uruguay and Paraguay, if any intercourse at all is main ained with them, should be consolidated with the Argentine Republic. There are no relations between those states that go to make them harmonize in a diplomatic way. On the other hand, there are constant troubles, outbreaks, and wars occurring between those governments. So far as intercourse is concerned with Uruguay and Paraguay, it may be said that we need no minister whatever there. But there is a large commerce with Uruguay, mainly at the city of Montevideo, one that should be encouraged and nourished. And at the same time, unless we propose to strike out pretty much all these South American missions, it is fitting that a minister should be allowed there. There are a large number of American residents there at the present time; there is an important commerce of ours there; and a minister at this reduced rate I am sure cannot be objectionable even in the line of economy pursued in this bill. I hope that in this matter neither the gentleman from Mississippi nor the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will object to my amendment.

Mr. SINGLETON. In the consolidation which we have made of these South American missions, we are but following the example which was set us several years ago by a republican Congress. In order that I may show the gentleman that there is not that reason for his amendment which he seems to think there is, permit me to read from the Congressional Globe of 1868-69. I do not know whether the gentleman was a member of Congress or not at that time. We are but following in the line that was dictated to us by a republican Congress. Let me read. The consular and diplomatic appropriation bill was then under consideration:

Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by adding at the end of the pending paragraph the following:

"Provided, That the minister accredited to the government of Nicaragua shall also be accredited to the governments of Honduras, Guatemala, San Salvador, and Costa Rica, and shall receive as compensation $9,000 a year, with a secretary of legation who shall receive a salary of $1,500 a year and no more.

The minister at New Granada shall also be accredited to the governments of Venezuela and Ecuador, and shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year, with a secretary of legation who shall receive a salary of $1,500 a year and no more.

The minister at Uruguay shall also be accredited to the Argentine Confederation, and shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year and no more, with a secretary of legation who shall receive a salary of $1,500 a year and no more.

The minister at Peru shall also be accredited to the governments of Chilí and Bolivia, and shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year, with a secretary of legation who shall receive a salary of $1,000 a year and no more.

Mr. Butler then went on to give his reasons for the amendment, and if I had time I would like to read the remarks of the gentleman.

Mr. HALE. The House did not agree to that amendment.
Mr. SINGLETON. It did that very thing.
Mr. RANDALL. The House adopted the amendment.
Mr. HALE. Then it must have been overruled elsewhere, because it never became the law.

Mr. SINGLETON. It was adopted by this House nem. con. I supposed that some gentlemen in the House would make an objection to posed that some gentlemen in the House would make an objection to the consolidation, and would make elaborate speeches upon it; but there was not a single voice raised against it. We are but following the example that was set us by Congress in 1868-'69.

Mr. HALE. Hardly "set by Congress," my friend will see.

Mr. SINGLETON. Well, by the House; by this part of Congress.

Mr. BANKS. What is the date of that?

Mr. SINGLETON. February 6, 1869.

Mr. HALE. I think it must be very evident to the gentleman that no attention was called to the matter, from the fact that he says it was passed in the House perm come.

was passed in the House nem. con.

Mr. SINGLETON. I have here the remarks made by Mr. Butler at length. I would like to read to the gentleman the reasons given for the consolidation, which reasons have just as much force to day as they then had. I will ask the Clerk to read the remarks of Mr. Butler at that time.

Mr. BANKS. The amendment went to the Senate and was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend the pending amendment by striking out the last word in order to state that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Hale] is perhaps aware of the belligerent condition of Paraguay and of its hostility to Brazil, and will further recollect that this consolidation-

Mr. HALE. I know that Paraguay is pretty much wiped out.
Mr. RANDALL. The consolidation is somewhat in the line of the suggestion made by the Secretary of State himself in our committeeroom on the day when he appeared before us. In fact I may say that this consolidation was made rather at his suggestion than at the instance of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. I hardly think the gentleman would say that deliberately. I have here a memorandum from the State Department saying that this is not deemed an expedient consolidation.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not mistaken. My memory upon this point is as clear and distinct as of any act I ever witnessed in my life.

Mr. HALE. Of course the gentleman knows that it is not proper for either him or me to state what occurred in the committee at a con-

Mr. HALE. This is a matter best settled by the formal communication of the Department to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I did not mean to transcend any legitimate rule of decorum. I supposed the House wanted information, and I

was giving it.

Mr. BANKS. I rise to oppose the amendment. The suggestion of the Secretary of State to the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon the combination of these diplomatic posts was governed by considerations not so much of political affinity as of contiguity and reasonable opportunities of reaching the different posts. The objection stated by the Secretary of State to the Committee on Foreign Affairs to the combination of University and Paragraphy was not based upon political. combination of Uruguay and Paraguay was not based upon political considerations; the objection, as he stated, had relation to the opportunities and facilities of getting from one country to the other.

In regard to what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Singleton] has said about the action of the House in 1869, the probability is that the House agreed to the consolidation of these diplomatic stations, that the Senate disagreed to it, and that, upon consideration of the subject by a committee of conference, the House assented to the representation as it had existed before. And an explanation of the fact that there was no debate may perhaps be given in this way: that as that there was no debate may perhaps be given in this way: that as this consolidation had been urged for many years there was a disposition on the part of the House at last to try it. Although I had always opposed it myself, I did consent in the House that the consolidation or combination as then proposed should be made. But the Senate disagreed to the proposition, and the committee of conference on the part of the two Houses thought it best to continue the representation as it had before existed.

Mr. SINGLETON. I simply wish to say that there was considerable debate on this subject; it was participated in by Mr. Butler himself, by Mr. Maynard, and by others.

Mr. BANKS. Very likely.

Mr. SINGLETON. The Congressional Globe shows that fact; and was after discussion that the House agreed to the proposition.

Mr. BANKS. It is an old question; it has been debated here for many years and defeated many times. I do not see that there is any harm under the existing circumstances in consenting to a reasonable consolidation where the minister has reasonable facilities of access to both the countries to which he is accredited.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. Hale, it was not agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to amend by striking out in the twentieth line the words "and the Hawaiian Islands;" inserting the word "and" before "Venezuela," and changing the aggregate of the appropriation by striking out "fifty-eight" and inserting "thirty-eight." I will state my reasons for offering the amendment.

The Hawaiian Islands have a population of not over 50,000. The government is very inconsiderable. A consulate has been established there at a salary of $3,500 by this bill; and to give a minister resident there $6,500, the same that is allowed to the minister to Portugal or Belgium, or any similar power, seems to me entirely unnecessary. The amount of trade—exports and imports—between this country and the Hawaiian Islands does not exceed $2,000,000 annually. A consulate of high grade seems to me all that is necessary for the pur-

Mr. HALE. Aside from either population or trade, there are certain reasons why a mission to the Hawaiian Islands should be kept up; and it was those reasons, I may say, that influenced the Committee on Appropriations in leaving the provision for this mission in the bill. The Sandwich Islands, as they are commonly called, have a peculiar relation, not only in the present, but in the promise of the future, to the vast commerce which in the years to come must be opened in the Pacific Seas. So marked and salient a point do they present in view of that commerce that there is constantly on the part of Great Britain an endeavor to gain the leading influence and control there, so that by and by, when the islands drop into the hands of some great power, that power shall be Great Britain, rather than ourselves or any other nation. One main object, therefore, of this mission is to maintain what at present exists there: the ascendency of American influence.

I do not believe that the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Tucker,] with his mind directed to this view—and he is a man who can appreciate the vast commercial advantages which in the years to come will be derived from the United States, rather than Great Britain, having the control and ascendency in those islands—I do not believe that he, with that view, would be in favor of striking down this mission. It is a moral influence that is to be exerted upon the people of those islands; and it is a moral influence that cannot be exerted by a mere consular business agent. That government is feeble, its peo-ple are few, its revenues small; but still it has the form and some of the panoply of a monarchy; and to be regarded as a power to which a minister shall be sent has always been, and is to-day, deemed by that people an especially gratifying fact.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, if this mission be abolished, in order to save this sum of money which the gentleman seeks to save, we will in the near future lose, in my judgment, untold thousands and perhaps millions in our commerce for every dollar that is saved. These islands had better be kept under our protection so far as that can be done through the influence of this mission.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does the British government keep a minister

Mr. HALE. I do not exactly know the title given to the British agent at the Sandwich Islands; but Lean state to the gentleman that there is not a month in the year when the British empire is not seeking to get control and to hold supreme influence over those islands.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think the gentleman from Maine is right.

Mr. HALE. Of course I am; and this Government cannot afford to give up the influence which it now holds there.

Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Maine will be withdrawn for a moment.

ill be withdrawn for a moment.

Mr. HALE. I replied to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to amend by striking out the last ord. I will not detain the committee long. We have provided not word. I will not detain the committee long. We have provided not only for a minister resident to the Hawaiian Islands at a salary of $5,500, but we have also provided for a consul of the second class at Honolulu at a salary of $3,500 per annum. Now, considering the population and the extent of the commerce of that kingdom, it would seem that this is out of all disproportion to the other provision contained in this bill. Itherefore suggest to the gentleman we make the minister resident also consul-general and reduce the consulate at Honolulu down to a lower rate. We have placed this position unusually high, considering population and commerce, and we have done so on account of the fact mentioned by the gentleman from Maine.

These islands are in the treak of what must be in the acaly fortune.

These islands are in the track of what must be in the early future to us an important commerce. Their relation also to our Pacific coast makes it important that they should be regarded with special consideration. I make the suggestion, for the purpose of getting rid of the anomaly of the great expense of these positions as compared with the other provisions in this bill, that we make the minister resident also consul-general, fixing the salary at $3,500, as his duties are mainly those of consul-general rather than anything else and dispense with the consulate at Honolulu or reduce it to a lower rate. How will that suit the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. HALE. While I can sympathize with what the gentleman is seeking to obtain, yet just at present, with the critical commercial relations between us and those islands, and considering the fact that there is to-day before Congress a provision in respect to a treaty, it must be evident that any act of ours reducing our representation there will be looked upon by that people as an indication of failing interest on our part for them. I do not know that difficulty will arise if we leave the minister as he is and reduce the consulate to a lower grade; but, looking at the whole subject in the view in which I have already presented it, I am very anxious that nothing should be done which would indicate to those people that we meant to let go the hold we have upon them now and let them slip into the control of any other power. I know the gentleman is intelligent on the subject of our commerce and its necessities, for he has served on the Committee on Commerce, and I feel assured that he will agree with me that it is not advisable to do any such thing at this time. I ask the mission be left as it is, and then, when we come to the consulate, we can determine whether it shall be transferred to a lower grade or not. It is a subject which I had not examined, but for the present I think we had better let this stand as it is.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, withdrew his pro forma amend-

The question then recurred on Mr. Tucker's amendment. The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 68. Mr. Tucker demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TUCKER and Mr. HALE were appointed.

Mr. HALE. I hope gentlemen will be content to let this go as it is.
Mr. RANDALL. Let us strike this out, and when we come to the consulate we can make a provision which will be satisfactory.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 85.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I give notice that I will ask for a vote by yeas and mays on this proposition in the House.

Mr. TUCKER. At the suggestion of my friend from Indiana and to carry out the views I have, I am perfectly willing to add this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For minister resident and consul-general at the Hawaiian Islands, $3,000.

Mr. HALE. That is less than the consul-general gets at the pres ent time. I do not wish to say anything more than that.

Mr. TUCKER. Then I will modify my amendment and make it $3,500. I may be permitted to say, in answer to what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Hale] said a moment ago, that I appreciate as highly as he does the command by the American Government of the Pacific; but I would achieve it in some other way than by creating a minister resident at the Hawaiian Islands at $6,500 and a consul-general at Honolulu at $3,500 per annum.

Mr. HALE. Does not the gentleman see that we are not creating, but that we are simply maintaining what was created years ago, and to which these people have become accustomed. And they measure the recognition of their importance largely by the kind of agent or minister that we send them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend from Maine bear in mind that we have but one consul there at a salary of $4,000 a year? We are proposing to do even more than that so far as commerce is concerned, and we will retain in our agent the character of minister, by the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire if there is a precedent anywhere in our diplomatic or commercial history for combining the two offices in one minister resident and consul?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, certainly; it is a very common thing in our practice.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman refer me to an instance? Mr. HOLMAN. I refer the gentleman to the case of Liberia, where we have a minister resident and consul-general. It is all through our system.

Mr. KASSON. I admit that the gentleman shows a precedent. I had forgot the case of Liberia, with which, however, we have almost no commercial relations.

Mr. HALE. Has the gentleman from Indiana ever known the case of a minister resident at a salary of $3,500 ?
Mr. HOLMAN. I know that the minister resident in Liberia, the offspring of our Republic, receives but $4,000.

Mr. HALE. But Liberia is an offspring that is almost dead, growing of little account and every year of still less account. But this is a growing child.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am sorry to hear my friend say so. The population is far greater and this republic has been planted by us and is

Mr. TUCKER. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman from Maine that we heard a great deal yesterday about the expenses at these European ports. You give your representative at one of these European ports $6,500, and you propose to give the same at the Hawaiian port, where I suppose the expenses cannot be so great as at the European,

Mr. HALE. The allowances have been cut down at the ports all over Europe

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to correct an error into which my friend from Maine has fallen. He says Liberia is a failing child and thinks this a growing one. He is mistaken in both propositions.

Mr. HALE. I did not mean to speak of the Hawaiian Islands as growing in population. I alluded to their importance, commercially and politically, in the future.

Mr. KELLEY. The Hawaiian population has dwindled down from 400,000 to 49,000, and they have never been able to tempt over 7,000 foreigners to live among them.

Mr. HALE. Those islands are getting into good shape for us to occupy them.

The question being taken on Mr. Tucker's amendment, the committee divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 73.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONROE. With the view which I have of the importance of the South American republics to us and our commerce, I do not wish to let this paragraph pass without offering one more amendment, and to let this paragraph pass without one ring one and the Appropri-I will then try to relieve the patience of my friends on the Appropri-te amend by inserting the word "Chili" ation Committee. I move to amend by inserting the word "Chili" after the word "Venezuela." I will explain in a moment what is my object in making this motion. I would insert Chili here, and, if the committee accept my amendment, I will then move to strike that word out in the next paragraph and insert "Peru" in its place, so as to connect Peru with Bolivia, and I will then move to strike out "Peru" in the paragraph following that. It will be a rather mild modification of the plan of the committee, and I should be very much gratified if it could be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the proposition?
Mr. MONROE. The plan is this: when the several motions have been adopted the modifications of the bill would be this: It would give Chili, which is really the most interesting and one of the most important of all the South American states—it would give that state a minister resident by itself at $5,500 a year.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will have one substantially now, will it not,

Chili being connected with Bolivia?

Mr. MONROE. I will explain. It would give Chili a minister by itself and would then attach Bolivia to Peru and give those two countries one minister. And the connections of Bolivia with Peru are so much closer than they are with Chili, because really all the commerce of Bolivia with foreign countries is done through a port of Peru, I have always felt willing to attach Bolivia to Peru and have but one minister to those two countries. Then we should leave Ecuador and Chili together and assign one minister to those two countries.

I think that gentlemen will find that it is nearly impracticable to have one minister attempt to represent the United States in all three of the states of Peru, Ecuador, and Colombia. Since I made some remarks on this subject the other day I have conversed with gentlemen who have been over all that ground, who have been from Bogota to Quito and from Quito to Lima, and it is the opinion of such gentlemen that it is impracticable for one minister to attempt to represent the United States at three states whose capitals are separated by such barriers of time and space.

Now, this modification is not a very great one of the committee's plan. It would give the most interesting state of South America, namely Chili, a minister by itself; it would assign one minister to Bolivia and Peru, which would naturally go together, and would then give one more minister to Ecuador and Chili. That is my plan.

Mr. HOLMAN. A good deal has been said on the subject of the liberality of Great Britain in promotion of her commerce by accrediting ministers and consuls to the various republics of South America. I have before me a statement, furnished by the State Department, showing that, while Great Britain finds it necessary to have a minister at Brazil, she has one minister, as we have, to all the Central American states; but she has only charges d'affaires at New Grenada, United States of Colombia, Venezuela, Peru, and Chili. That is the extent of her connection with the commerce and political relations of those countries, far less than this bill of ours proposes, while the commercial relation of those countries, as my friend well knows, are mainly with Great Britain,
Mr. MONROE. Will the gentleman tell us what pay Great Britain gives its chargés d'affaires ?

Mr. HOLMAN. The salaries are very materially greater than we

Mr. MONROE. Yes; £2,000 sterling per annum.
Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, and Great Britain gives her ministers larger salaries but she does not employ so many of them as are proposed, now as we are proposing; indeed Great Britain attaches no political importance to any part of South America except the Central American states and Brazil; all her relations are purely commercial, and she is represented there by commercial agents.

Mr. MONROE. The plan I propose now would give us the same number of ministers that Great Britain has there.

Mr. HOLMAN. We all know Great Britain has two ministers in South America, one at Brazil, and one at the Central American States, sent there for the manifest reason that her commerce is interested on that isthmus; but at all other positions she has chargé d'affaires, her relations being mainly commercial.

Mr. MONROE. Does not my friend from Indiana know that a

Mr. MONROE. Does not my friend from Indiana know that a chargé d'affairès is a diplomatic officer.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why certainly he has diplomatic powers, but directly connected with commerce. I will not say the State Department advises the combination proposed in this bill, but I do believe that that Department thinks th t if these combinations are to be made, it is proper that Chili and Bolivia should be placed together, and that Peru, Ecuador, and the United States of Colombia should be united together. It is the United States of Colombia, Chili, and Peru that furnish as commerce. Our relations with these states are important furnish us commerce. Our relations with these states are important on no political account. I believe the Committee on Appropriations were unanimous in the opinion that if this combination was proper at all, we have made the proper combination.

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

For minister resident accredited to Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras, Salvador, and Nicaragua, to reside at the place that the President may select in either of the states named, $10,000.

Mr. HALE. I rise for the purpose of asking why, if other consolidated missions are put at $6,500 a year, this one is put at $10,000? Why should they not be the same?

Mr. HOLMAN. I rose at the same time the gentleman did for the purpose of offering an amendment on that point. If he will offer it there will be no objection to it.

Mr. HALE. In other cases the ministers have to travel much more than in this. I yield to the gentleman to offer the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$6,500;"

this was a mere oversight.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.
The Clerk read as follows:

For salary of the secretary to the legation (when acting also as interpreter) at Japan, $3,000.

Mr. SEELYE. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what would take place if the secretary of legation was not able to act as interpreter, which I believe is actually the fact at the present time. It has been the case, Mr. Chairman, that no person in Japan who would be accepted perhaps as secretary

Mr. RANDALL. The salary of the secretaries of legation was formerly $2,500; we have raised it to $3,000, with the view of allowing him $500 for the purpose of paying an interpreter.

Mr. SEELYE. The salaries of the secretary of legation in Japan was $2,500 and the salary of the interpreter was $2,500.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; you are correct in that.

Mr. SEELYE. It has been necessary here to have the posts occupied by different men, and I suppose that necessity exists at the present time.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee found that in other places where we employ interpreters the work could be done for $500; and therefore they deemed it best to make it uniform

Mr. SEELYE. The gentleman will allow me to say that in reference to China the only man in the Chinese Empire who could act as interpreter was

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Williams.
Mr. SEELYE. Yes, Dr. Williams; but this condition does not exist

Mr. RANDALL. We used to allow the secretaries of legation $2,500 a year; and we propose now to allow them an additional $500 in order that they may employ an interpreter, and I think that that amount is sufficient.

Mr. SEELYE. I suppose that $500 would not employ a competent interpreter for the legation at Japan.

Mr. RANDALL. The same thing is done in regard to Turkey; that is to say, it did exist heretofore as to Turkey, and we have allowed

Mr. SEELYE. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out the words "when acting also as interpreter," and changing the amount from $2,500 to $3,000.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the amendment in the way of a substitute for the paragraph. I move to strike out the pending paragraph, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

For salary of the secretary of legation at Japan, $2,500.

For an interpreter, while employed as such, a salary at the rate of $2,500 per annum.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the present law.

Mr. CONGER. I know that. I believe there has been no case where the law provided a secretary to act also as interpreter, except in the case of China. That required a special act of Congress in order to authorize one person to hold two offices, to act in two capacities and draw two salaries. A special act was passed authorizing that to be done in the case of the only man probably who could combine the duties of secretary with that of interpreter, that is Mr. Williams, the old missionary to China. I understand that that combination of these two offices in one person has been very satisfactory and advantageous to the Government. I learn from the State Department that there is no person sufficiently familiar with the Japanese language who could act as secretary of legation and also be a suitable interpreter for the lega-which they have reported appropriates $3,000 for salary of secretary which they have reported appropriates $3,000 in sainty of secretary of legation when also acting as interpreter at Japan. Former bills have appropriated $2,500 for secretary of legation in Japan and $2,500 when acting as interpreter. It is probable that the appropriation which has been made for several years for the salary of $3,000 for a secretary of legation in China when acting as interpreter, at $5,000, has induced this clause in the present bill. The fact is that but a single citizen of the United States, Mr. Williams, was known to be competent as secretary and able to speak the Chinese language and to act as interpreter. He has been connected with the American legation in China since June 27, 1855, and has received an increased compensation of $5,000 on account of his long service and his capacity to speak and write

It will be remembered that the authority for Mr. Williams to hold the offices of secretary of legation and interpreter was given by a special act. Without this special legislation it would be extremely doubtful, even if an individual were found capable of performing both duties, if he could hold the office and receive compensation. If the provisions in this bill are to remain, no American citizen is known who can speak Japanese who is fitted for the position of secretary of legation; and the Revised Statutes prohibit any diplomatic officer who is not a citizen of the United States from receiving com-pensation. The effect, therefore, must be either to have no inter-preter and no person who can speak the language at the legation in Japan, and to increase the salary of the secretary of legation to $3,000 upon the theory that he performs interpreter's services, which he is incapable of doing, or to leave both offices vacant.

The question was taken upon the substitute moved by Mr. CONGER;

The question was then taken upon the amendment moved by Mr.

SEELYE; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following: For the salary of the secretary to the legation (when acting also as interpreter) at China, $3,000.

Mr. SEELYE. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$3,000" and inserting "$5,000." As I said before, this Government is exceedingly fortunate in securing the services of probably the only man in the Chinese Empire competent to fill both of these offices; the only man that the Chinese government and our own Government might be said to have equal confidence in. When one thinks of the worth of the confidence of such a people as the Chinese in the diplomatic officers with whom they have to do, I think gentlemen will all acknowledge that it is important to keep these offices in the hands of the present holder.

Mr. RANDALL. I agree with everything the gentleman has said in reference to the character of this officer. He is here now. I have conversed with him, have obtained a great deal of information from him, and have had a very satisfactory interview with him. But we cannot on that account vary the general purpose of the bill, because by making this an exception we would be doing injustice to others. The increase the gentleman proposes in his amendment is certainly very much.

Mr. SEELYE. The increase is-

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know but what I would compromise on an increase of five hundred or a thousand dollars.

Mr. SEELYE. The increase is nothin more than we have paid for these services heretofore. Moreover, if this office of secretary of legation should be held by any other man, we would be obliged to pay the full amount of $5,000 for the two services of secretary of lega-the full amount of $5,000 for the two services of secretary of legation and interpreter.

Mr. RANDALL. Not at all; if we should have any other man we would only pay $2,500 for the secretary of legation, and then do just as we have done in the case of Japan, give $500 additional for the services of an interpreter. Perhaps I am too generous in my suggestion of a compromise. I find I am not sustained by my colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations, and therefore I withdraw the sug-

Mr. SEELYE. I think it would be very difficult to obtain in Japan the services of an interpreter for $500; much more difficult to obtain

them in Peking.

Mr. RANDALL. There are a great many American citizens on that coast whose services can very readily be obtained for that amount.

Mr. SEELYE. They will not be able to interpret for the American legation; they are not Americans that the Chinese government has that confidence in that it has in the present official.

The question was then taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. SEELYE; and it was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 68, noes 87.

Mr. SEELYE. I now move the amendment suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Ampropriations to make the amount $4000.

Mr. SELLIE. I now move the amendment suggested by the charman of the Committee on Appropriations, to make the amount $4,000.
Mr. RANDALL. I have withdrawn that suggestion.
Mr. HOLMAN. I hope—
Mr. RANDALL. Let us have a vote.
The question was then taken upon the amendment to increase the sum to $4,000; and it was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 91, noes 70.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following: For contingent expenses of foreign intercourse proper, and of all the missions abroad, $50,000.

I have made this proposition to restore the old rule. I submit it to the consideration of the Committee on Appropriations. The bill they have information from the State Department as to the suffi-Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the Committee on Appropriations if ciency of this sum; whether they can maintain the actual relations upon the basis of existing laws for $50,000 ?

Mr. RANDALL. I will state to the gentleman that one of the great abuses to which our attention has been called is this contingent allowance for the Departments. I believe that of the $100,000 heretofore appropriated, and it may be of the $50,000 which we propose to appropriate, much will be expended that we regard as abuses. We have therefore brought down the amount to such sum as we conceived to be entirely sufficient for this purpose during the next year.

Mr. KASSON. Let me ask the gentleman whether the committee really made a statement of that part of this expenditure which was regarded as abusive?

Mr. RANDALL. We looked over all the expenditures; we had a report in detail before us; and the Secretary of State was interrogated on that subject.

Mr. KASSON. Now my question is, what was the amount which the committee regarded as abusive, or, in other words, as being made up of unnecessary expenses?

Mr. RANDALL. Well, the gentleman can measure that by the amount we have cut down.

Mr. KASSON. I do not know whether I can. That is the point I am making. I want to see if the figures are upon that basis.

Mr. RANDALL. We came to the conclusion that cutting off the abuses $50,000 would be sufficient.

Mr. KASSON. I make this inquiry in great sincerity, because I know that a gentleman on this floor has information from the Department that, making all allowances, it will be impossible for the business of the Government to be transacted for the amount here pro-

The CHAIRMAN. This debate is entirely out of order. No amendment is pending.

Mr. KASSON. I move, then, to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Keim, who was before the committee, stated that in almost every instance a large part of this fund had been used, not legitimately in the payment of office-rent, but in paying the rent of residences of ministers.

Mr. KASSON. Did Mr. Keim mention the name of any one minister who paid the rent of his residence out of this fund?

Mr. BLOUNT. He did not mention any particular name; but he

Mr. BLOUNT. He did not mention any particular name; but he said that that was the general rule in reference to that fund; that there were great abuses in this matter.

Mr. KASSON. I should be glad to have a single instance given.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will understand that in many instances as much as $3,600 was allowed to different ministers as contingent expenses. I think my recollection on this point is accurate; if not, I can be corrected.

Mr. KASSON. Still the gentleman does not seem to understand this point: It is charged that out of these contingent expenses ministers have paid the rent of their residences. Now, in the absence of any single instance specifically stated I must dissent from that statement, because it is contradictory to all my former information about the Department. I have in former days had charge of diplomatic bills in this House, and I never found a single instance in which the rent of the residence of any minister was paid out of the contingent fund. Hence I ask again for a single case in which this has been done and the charge al'owed by the Department.

Mr. SINGLETON. I have here a partial statement furnished at our request by the Secretary of State. We have time and again sought information on this subject; but we have never been able to get a satisfactory account of the manner in which this contingent has been used. Here is a partial statement which has been furnished to us and which, if the gentleman will examine it, he will find altogether unsatisfactory. He will find that this account foots up only $13,530.

Mr. KASSON. But the gentleman will remember that the chairman of the committe [Mr. RANDALL] has just stated that they had the items before them.

Mr. SINGLETON. That was in regard to the $131,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I am corrected properly by the gentleman from Mississippi. The items we did get were as to another appropriation—the contingent fund of $131,000 appropriated in last year's bill.

Mr. SINGLETON. I propose to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] to some of the expenditures embraced in this propert.

Mr. KASSON. I will not require the gentleman to do that if only the general information I have asked for can be given, which is simply as to the rule by which the committee have reduced this sum; because the Department does unquestionably say that the business of the Department properly chargeable to contingencies cannot be carried on for this amount. Hence my inquiry to the gentleman as to the rule by which the committee have ascertained the amount necessary; whether they have cut off from the estimates submitted the sary; whether they have cut off from the estimates submitted the amounts they regarded as irregnlar and nunecessary, or whether they have taken a running jump at the amount, and cut it down arbitrarily. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I renew the amendment. I desire to state that there are two items for contingent expenses in this bill. One is for intercourse with foreign nations and all our missions abroad, $50,000. It was formerly $100,000. The other is for contingent expenses of Unite I States consulates, such as stationery, book-cases, &c., $100,000. Under the head of intercourse proper, the contingent expenses of ministers resident and plenipotentiaries to foreign courts were paid last year, and, on an examination of the accounts in the office of the Fifth year, and, on an examination of the accounts in the office of the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, we found the rent of offices of foreign ministers charged up in this contingent account.

Mr. KASSON. The rent, not of residences, but of offices?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; I am not speaking of residences. Auother reason, I presume, why the committee have reduced this appropriation to $50,000 is that an item of $10,000 for presents to Turkish officials was paid out of this appropriation. priation to $50,000 is that an item of $10,000 for presents to Turkish officials was paid out of this appropriation. Also, the sum of $25,000 for paying the expense of dispatching in London, which expense at this time can almost entirely, or at least three-quarters of it, be dispensed with, without any detriment to the public service; for, sir, we have recently established a postal treaty with nearly every civilized nation on the earth, by means of which we can send mail-matter from this country at the mere cost of transportation by putting the official stamp of this Government upon it. That stamp, paid for by this Government, will carry it to its destination in any government embraced in the postal union. Yet $11,000 a year in gold in London is asked to pay for stamps in England and to pay postage on these printed documents sent out to the various ministers and consuls abroad. It is because we can dispense with this expense that this abroad. It is because we can dispense with this expense that this item has been cut down. Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the honorable gentleman let me ask him whether this is the provision for diplomatic officers, where they do business!

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.
Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I understand the chairman to say there was found charged among the items of expense the rent of offices?
Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.
Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is it true that it is now proposed they shall no longer have any allowance for offices in which to do business

Mr. SPRINGER. There is nothing in that respect.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is nothing in that respects.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then you are at variance, as I understand it, with the chairman of the committee, for I understand the chairman to say they found that rent charged. It is charged, has been from the foundation of the Government, and must be, I suppose, been from rotal data on or the Government, and must be, I suppose, to the close of the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. These contingent expenses are governed entirely by the Department, and are allowed by the Department here; but there is no particular appropriation for rent for any particular office. Mr. RANDALL. If gentlemen will look to page 11, lines 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, they will discover all these items are provided for, such as rent, freight, postage, and other miscellaneous matters. I underas rent, freight, postage, and other miscellaneous matters. I understand this item relates to those ministers who have a rest or vacation of two months. They propose to give $59,000 for that purpose or for what is called "lapping." That is, when a minister is absent for sixty days, he is allowed to receive his pay, while the next in rank, who takes his place, receives one-half of his pay.

Mr. HALE. Does he refer to this as covering those cases?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; those "lapping" cases.

Mr. HALE. Then what is the item in line 40 "for chargés d'affaires ad interim and diplomatic officers abroad, $20,000?" That is the item which covers the class of cases to which the gentleman has just referred. I think he will find, on reflection, that this item of $50,000 does not cover any of these cases.

does not cover any of these cases.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a part of the contingencies abroad—the twenty thousand as well as the fifty thousand.

Mr. HALE. But the twenty thousand covers the class of cases to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. RANDALL. They are covered in both items.
Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

SCHEDULE B.

For the agent and consul-general at Cairo, $3,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move to amend by striking out the word "three," in line 67, and inserting "four." My reason for that, Mr. Chairman, is briefly this: The consul-general at Cairo is also the Mr. Chairman, is briefly this: The consul-general at Cairo is also the diplomatic agent of this Government. Egypt is not an independent but a quasi sovereignty, and it happens at this particular moment to occupy a very important position in reference to the commerce of the world. It is known to every gentleman upon this floor that within three days the speech of the Queen of Great Britain has referred to the control secured to that country of the Suez Canal. It is also known that very large English loans are being made to the Pasha of Egypt; and the probability is that the commercial control of that country, which means the control of the trade of the East Indies, is to pass into the hands of Great Britain. We have commercial interests not merely directly with Egypt, but with the great East beyond, and it is most important that this position of consul-general should be filled by a man who is competent not merely to discharge should be filled by a man who is competent not merely to discharge the ordinary duties of a consular office but also with capacity and comprehension enough to understand precisely the nature of the policy which is soon to be inaugurated in that country. The recent consul-general of Egypt, Mr. Beardsley, is just dead. I understand his successor has been nominated and his confirmation is pending in the

I think I need not say another word to the gentlemen of this House beyond the mere statement I have made to show that no man of sufficient ability can be got to fill that place for the sum of $3,000 per annum. I doubt whether he can be got for $4,000; but I am unwilling, in the present temper of the House, to go beyond one additional thousand dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the proposition, if I understand it correctly, of the gentleman from New York is simply to increase the salary to $4,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes; that is it.

Mr. HEWHI1, of New York. Yes; that is it.
Mr. HOLMAN. So it is merely a question, not of diplomacy, or of the importance of this mission, but a question whether the salary shall be $3,000 or $4,000 a year. The fact that Great Britain is obtaining the control of the Suez Canal does not seem to affect this question at all. We think it does not increase the importance of our relations with that portion of the Turkish Empire. That Great Britain is likely to obtain important control over that part of the world is quite manifest. But that certainly does not increase or complicate our relations with the Turkish Empire.

The title of this officer of the Government is agent and consul-general. It is a purely commercial relation; for the remarkable and anomalous relation of Egypt to the Turkish Empire still leaves our political relations with that country, so far as treaties and amity of commerce are concerned, with the old Byzantium, Constantinople. So it is a mere question of commerce, and in that respect this is not a very important position.

I can well see that if our commerce to the East were largely affected by the Suez Canal there might be increased importance attaching to this position on account of the increased commercial relations; while the Suez Canal is being constructed on the one side, shortening the travel between the East and the Atlantic, on the other side the whole current of our commerce has been changed by the opening up of the through route from New York to San Francisco, and the Pacific Ocean becomes the great highway of America, not the Mediterranean Sea, the great waters which formerly bore the commerce of the world. Our commercial relations in all likelihood will diminish rather than increase with the regions of country connected with the old Mediterranean commerce. We think $3,000 a year very ample provision for this station.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. Hewitt, of New York, it was not agreed to.

The following paragraph was read: For salaries of consulates, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and thirteen consular clerks, $230,400.

Mr. SEELYE. I move to amend by striking out "$230,400" in the eighty-seventh line, and inserting in lieu thereof "$232,900."

I offer this amendment intending to move to amend line 101 by inserting Singapore in class 4. My reasons for that can be very simply stated. We all know that since the introduction of steam the most prodigious revolution accomplished in the commerce of the globe has been wrought by the opening of the Suez Canal. In consequence of that event almost the entire commerce between eastern Asia and Europe is obliged to pass through the gates of Singapore. consequence of that event almost the entire commerce between eastern Asia and Europe is obliged to pass through the gates of Singapore. 'Lying as it does at the southeastern opening of the Straits of Malacca, every steamer from any port in Japan or China for India, or Ceylon, or Egypt, or Europe, must touch at Singapore, and does touch there. Our own commerce is very slight there, owing to reasons which I think are sufficiently apparent, but which need not here be dwelt upon. Our commerce is very slight indeed, but our consul there has a prodigious service to American travelers and American business interests to perform. And when we remember what Great business interests to perform. And when we remember what Great Britain is trying to accomplish, and is doing, in gaining hold of the entire control of the islands of the East Indies, and that if we abolish this consulate at Singapore we have not a single foothold there, I claim that the committee should authorize the insertion of this in the class I have indicated.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a mere question of salary. We have not abolished the consulate at all. We have transerred it to class 5.

The gentleman will find it there.

Mr. SEELYE. I know it is in class 5. I know also that the salary in class 4 is inadequate to the support of our present consul there and his family. He is obliged to live in Singapore and his family at home.

Mr. RANDALL. We have not reached class 5 yet.
Mr. SEELYE. But Singapore is taken from class 4 and placed in class 5. My amendment is to change the amount in line 87 so that this consul may be placed in class 4.
Mr. RANDALL. I will suggest to the geutleman, if he will permit me, how he can reach his object. When we reach class 4 he may move to insert Singapore there; and if the House approve of his amendment it can be taken out when we reach class 5.

Mr. SEELYE. I had supposed that it was necessary to vote the money necessary before the consulate could be inserted in class 4.

Mr. RANDALL. The amount of the item covering all these consulates will be regulated when we have gone through the whole list.

Mr. HALE. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not object, if any additional consuls are inserted, to the figures here being changed?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly not.

Mr. SEELYE. Very well, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know if it is the understanding of the committee that if consuls are added the paragraph fixing the aggregate may be corrected.

Mr. RANDALL. Or if consuls are deducted. Certainly; that is always done.

Mr. SEELYE. With that understanding I withdraw my amendment.
Mr. HOLMAN. The consul at Honolulu perhaps ought not to be in that classification as matters are now. As we have created a minister resident and consul-general at that port at a salary of $5,000, and that being an important port, it would seem that the classification should be different, and for the purpose of adding it to class 5 I move to strike it out now.

Mr. RANDALL. That is right.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that it be stricken out from class 2.

The question was taken; and on a division there were ayes 80, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move to insert in line 95 the words "Chin-Kiang and Ningpo." I do not move to insert Swatow, which is also stricken out of the bill of last year, for reasons which I shall give.

In the speech of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations yesterday he says:

We discovered that as far back as 1870 Mr. Seward, the consul at Shanghai, since promoted. I believe, as minister to China, recommended the abolition of this consulate. We have remitted that port to the fee system, because the trade, which has fallen off at that place, is carefully taken care of by the consul at Shanghai. The consul at Chin-Kiang formerly granted permits so that persons could go into the interior of China and make sale of their goods. This was the sole benefit which resulted in the most prosperous times of that consulate. Now the same duty is performed by the consul at Shanghai.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know upon whose authority the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations makes that assertion, and I trust he will give it. I have been this morning to the State Department, and have gone very carefully over the files of the Department, assisted by one of the heads of Bureaus. and I find no recommendation of that sort upon the files of the office, but possibly we were not able to discover it.

In the next place, as to the falling off of fees, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations does not seem to comprehend that the fees are due rather to the exports from that country than to the imports from this country into China. There are no fees on imports; there are only fees upon exports. All the commerce of a large area of the country watered by the Yang-tse-Kiang passes through the consulate at Chin-Kiang, near the mouth of that river. By our treaty with China we have a right to pass our imports into the country, but under the treaty it is an open question whether we have a right to force the Chinese to allow their exports to come out into the commerce of the world at Chin-Kiang. Throughout that portion of the Chinese domain there are many provinces, at the head of which are viceroys, and they can erect customs-barriers; and the reason for the reduction of fees is that occasionally a viceroy sets up such a barrier and will not allow exports to come out. I find that in one case a viceroy stopped exports for four months, but our consul finally got the order revoked and the trade restored, and then the export trade was resumed and the consular fees increased. But the thing that concerns us most is the import trade, because it makes a market for our products; and unless we have a man of firmness and ability stationed there we are likely to lose the import trade of that entire tee was this:

There has prevailed there a practice such as this: For a consideration of, say, $200 the consul has absolutely sold to native boats and crews from that port and various other places the American flag, which was used in assisting smuggling goods into the interior of China. And this character of business was permitted by the State Department, which seems to command so much respect on the other side of the

Now, in regard to the Ningpo consul, there is Dr. Edward C. Lord; he is a clergyman and a man of eminent qualifications for his position, and no complaint, as I am assured by the Secretary of State, has ever been made of this traffic in the American flag; and, if any man here knows that such a traffic is carried on, it is no reason for abolishing the consulate, although it would be a good reason for turning out the consul. If any man here has that information in his breast it is his duty to go to the State Department and give information of the fact. Now, sir, in this connection allow me to read a dispatch from the consul-general at Shanghai, Mr. George F. Seward, to the Secretary of State; it is as follows:

United States Consulate-General, Shanghai, October 21, 1874.

Shanghai, October 21, 1874.

Sir: I have the honor to transmit to you herewith a copy of a letter (No. 401) which I have addressed to the legation suggesting that the minister should mention to the Department the propriety of retaining the services of Dr. Lord as consul at Ningpo.

If the Government should go seeking for an officer for Ningpo throughout the whole service, it could hardly secure a better one. If it appoint one from home there is not one chance in ten that a person so well fitted by natural endowments for the work would be secured; and of course in such event Dr. Lord's lorg experience and his knowledge of all Chinese matters and of the language would be lost to us. to us.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

GEORGE F. SEWARD, Consul-Gene

Hon. John L. Cadwalader, Assistant Secretary of State, Washington.

Here is another dispatch, signed by Mr. Avery, the predecessor of Mr. Seward as minister to China, in which he comments in equally strong language upon the importance of the services of Dr. Lord and of the consulate at Ningpo, in connection with the business interests of this country. It is as follows:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, Peking, November 2, 1874.

Peking, November 2, 1874.

Sir: The consul general has recently addressed me in respect to the Ningpo consulate, which has, by the last consular appropriation bill, been restored to the list of salaried consulates, and urged the claim of Edward C. Lord to be retained as consul. Mr. Seward informs me that he has sent a cryp of his dispatch of October 29, 1874, on this subject, to you, so that there seems to be no necessity or repeat it in this dispatch, but to refer to it as containing the most cogent reasons for continuing him at the post. His experience in the usages of the port where he has lived nearly thirty years, his acquaintance with the spoken and written languages of China, and his long and faithful services in the consulate all prove the desirableness of making no change. A reference to the correspondence from this legation will afford you all needed proofs of this position; but I may content myself with noticing the settlement he made of the difficulties at Hang-Chow, in 872 and 1873, as set forth in Mr. Low's dispatches Nos. 202 and 211, and Mr. William's No. 17, which it is quite within propriety to say could not have been so satisfactorily made by any other foreign official in that region. If services and qualifications like those possessed and done by Dr. Lord do not constitute a claim and a reason for keeping bim in his post, I know not where you will find stronger; but I cherish the idea that this plea in his behalf is unnecessary on my part, because you have no intention of superseding him.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJ. P. AVERY.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State.

I will only add that it is the deliberate opinion of the State Department that these two consulates cannot be dispensed with

Mr. RANDALL. In reply to the gentleman I will first allude to Ningpo, and will give him my authority for what I stated yesterday. If he will look at Executive Document No. 11, Forty-second Congress, second session, which the State Department ought to have seen and known of, he will read the following as among some of the com-plaints in connection with this consulate. It is dated December 23, 1870, and written from Shanghai. I read from it the following:

First. The granting of the American flag to a number of Ningpo (native) boats and native junks. Native vessels sailing under a foreign flag are known as lorchas.

The object in seeking a foreign flag is the evasion of the Chinese laws controlling the river or coast trade of the open portions of the empire, by Chinese and foreigners in native craft. In this species of enterprise foreign parties generally share the proceeds. About 1863 the number of lorchas under the American flag, it is stated, was not less than sixty. Before and since, the American flag was thus perverted and dishonored for the practice of illegal trade.

I ask now whether I was not justified in everything which I said upon this subject? This is the report of an officer appointed by the present President of the United States, and it is his statement that the flag of the United States is dishonored by the consuls selling to foreigners the right to carry on illicit commerce under the American foreigners the right to carry on illicit commerce under the American flag. I think I have pretty well disposed of that.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I might make a remark, but after my experience of yesterday perhaps I ought not to venture to do so.

Mr. RANDALL. That experience I cannot help. As to Chin-Kiang, we had the authority and recommendation of Mr. Flint, who formerly held a position either at that point or somewhere near. B. t I do not have to rely upon Mr. Flint or upon anything other than the report published under the eye of the State Department. Mr. A. E. Salter perhaps the Department can tell who he is-in a long communication dated September 30, 1874, gives three principal reasons for the decline of trade at that port. He says:

of trade at that port. He says:

The principal causes of this decline are, I consider, three:
First. The excessive imports of foreign manufactured woolens and cottons during the years 1871 and 1872, all of which were sent direct to the consuming district inland, and a large portion of the excess is still undistributed.

Second. The deterioration of English and other cotton goods sent to China, more especially shirtings and drills, which have, during the past two or three years, been very much overweighted with foreign matter, (size,) losing, after being washed, in some cases 34 per cent. (In this connection it will be well to mention the difference in American and English cotton manufactures, the former in no case losing more than 34 to 5 per cent. after washing.)

Third. The withdrawal by the Chinese government of the facilities granted under what was termed "export transit passes," for the barter of native produce for cottons, by which the foreign merchant was enabled to take in exchange for his goods the products of the country immediately around the districts consuming the foreign article. It must, however, be pointed out that the regulations under which these passes were issued necessitated the exports to a foreign country of the goods bought in the interior, and the failure to do this by the foreign trader caused the authorities to withdraw the privilege. These goods, however, were mostly of a character unsuited to markets outside of China. The renewal of these passes under a different form has been talked of, but at present the matter is in abeyance.

And he also says:

And he also says:

And he also says:

Before concluding this report I think it well to point out the great falling off in the receipts of fees for this year when compared with previous ones. The table annexed will give the receipts of this, as well as former years, and I would remark that the causes of this falling off, in my opinion, have been through the alterations in the manner of collecting the tonnage dues on American vessels trading on this river, (vide circular No. 43, section 331 of the Consular Regulations.) and also to the withdrawal of the export transit passes. These passes had to be vised by the consul, for which a charge of $$2$ per seal was made under regulation, and sometimes as many as one hundred passes per week went through the consulate.

After a review of the trade of this port and consular district for the year, and from a perusal of the tables annexed, the conclusion will be arrived at that the business has not been up to the average of former years either in extent or profitableness.

Now, these are their own reports, upon which the committee base the action which they take, and to my mind they must be satisfactory to every intelligent man in this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word in the paragraph, for the purpose of making a single remark. I regret exceedingly to differ with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hewitt,] as he has manifestly devoted a great deal of attention to this bill and brings to its consideration a large amount of information. But I wish to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that this consular office at Ningpo is within the consulate of Amoy, and the consulate at Chin-Kiang is within the consulate of Canton. When these salaries were fixed the amount of fees largely exceeded the salaries, as gentlemen will remember. The low salaries at this time have not resulted from revolution, but from the fact that there has been a steady decline in the fees from year to year for the last few years. The re-decline in the fees from year to year for the last few years. The result is that both of these consulates yield only $946.68—the one of Chin-Kiang $371.84, and Ningpo $574.84.

But what I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to is this: The only effect of abolishing these consulates is to convert them into vice-consulates or commercial agencies. There will be a commercial agent or a vice-consul appointed at once to each of these places, if the business of the country requires it, and he will receive the fees, so that no commercial interest will suffer. We treat these consulates just as this Government has been in the habit of treating a very large portion of our consulates paying the count these sand pathing because. portion of our consulates, paying the consul the fees and nothing beyond. We certainly cannot afford to pay, as we do, $7,500 a year for these two consulates when the annual fees are less than $1,000. Let them become vice-consulates within the districts in which they are respectively placed.

We feel quite confident that upon this subject we are possessed of some information which my friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has not in his possession. We have been able to confer with gentlemen who, from long residence in China, are familiar with the business of both these consulates.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is the gentleman aware that one of these gentlemen was removed from the office of consul for malfeasance

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot say to whom the gentleman refers. I am able to say from my own knowledge that the gentleman from whom we obtained our information had no motive to misrepresent any fact valuable to the Government.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. In reply to the statement of the gen-tleman from Indiana, that no interest will suffer because the duties of these consulates can be transferred to a commercial agency, I am compelled to call his attention again to the peculiar nature of our consupelled to call his attention again to the peculiar nature of our consular system in China. Our consuls are not merely commercial agents; they are judicial officers. Under the treaty with China an American citizen cannot be arrested and tried in a Chinese court, but must be brought before the consul for trial. No American citizen can be sued in a Chinese court; if any claim is made against an American citizen it must be brought before the American consul for trial.

Now, in the dispatch I hold in my hand Mr. Seward says:

Thus, as commercial cities, neither Ningpo nor Chin-Kiang would deserve to be ranked before Kiu-Kiang; yet, owing to circumstances of location—Ningpo as near Shanghai, and a favorite resort of bad characters, and Chin-Kiang as the lowermost port of the Yang-tse River—they need more important consular establishments.

Now the testimony upon which the committee appear to have acted is that of an individual who, as I have said, (and the chairman of the committee has named him) was removed from the office of consul for malfeasance; and he has been about this Capitol endeavoring to destroy the position of his successor, one of the most estimable, able, and useful men in the service of this Government.

There is no difference of opinion on the part of Mr. Seward or Mr. Avery or the State Department as to the importance of these consulates, not merely with reference to trade but also with regard to their judicial functions. These gentlemen of the committee tell us that the business can be taken to Shanghai. Have they examined into the distance of these ports from Shanghai? To take these cases to Shanghai would be very much like arresting a mau in Charleston, South Carolina, and taking him to Portland, Maine, for trial. In one case, as I find, an unhappy Englishman who called himself an American seized where there was no consul and was hanged before he could assert his true nationality and get his case before the proper court. The same thing might happen to American citizens and irreparable injury inflicted before they could be brought to these distant consulates for

This is no mere question of dollars and cents, nor is it merely whether the dignity of the American name shall be preserved; but whether American merchants, American sailors, and American travelers shall be taken care of when they happen to go into that distant

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman say that the relation of these places to Amoy and Cauton is not the important question?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But Mr. Seward says, in a dispatch which I have read to the House, that these consulates should be made which I have read to the House, that these constitutes should be made more efficient. How does the gentleman deal with that?

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, there were—ayes 75, noes 84.

Mr. OLIVER called for tellers,

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Holman, and Mr. Hewitt, of New York, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 100. So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLASS TV

Manchester; Glasgow; Bradford; Demerara; Birmingham; Sheffield; Kingston, (Jamaica.)

Mr. SEELYE. I move to amend by adding to the clause just read the word "Singapore." This amendment proposes merely to restore this consulate to the position which it occupied last year. This consulate is growing in importance to the United States every year. It was never so important as now. I respectfully suggest to the Committee on Appropriations and to the Committee of the Whole that this is not a fit time for the reduction of this salary.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a mere question of salary, and the proposed increase is not large; but—

Mr. RANDALL. O, never mind; we will vote it down.
The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLASS V.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Singapore; Tunstall; Leeds; Dundee; Leith; Toronto; Hamilton; Halifax; St. John's, (New Brunswick;) Belfast.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend by inserting in class 5 "Nassau, New Providence." The fees at this place are considerably more than $1,500, the amount allowed to the class in which it is now placed. Besides that, there are many invalids going to Nassau, and a large extra duty is imposed on the consul.

Mr. RANDALL. I appreciate fully the fact that there has been an Ohioan filling this place. [Laughter.] But we cannot vary from the general rule on his account.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cape Haytien

Mr. HOLMAN. There was a consul-general at Port au Prince, and that seems to be the more important port, and I do not know but what it might have been better to have made the classification somewhat different from what it is. I move to strike out "Cape Haytien" and insert "Port au Prince."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I only wish to say that Port au Prince is one of the points to which I called the attention of the committee in that unhappy speech which contained so little in it; and that I have a mass of information in regard to other consulates, which in their order I proposed to submit to the House, but as I have no more meritorious cases than those in China, and having been fairly and squarely beaten on that issue, I do not propose longer to embarrass the committee or take up the time with amendments. I am glad the gentleman from Indiana took charge of Port au Prince, and put it in where

I think it ought to be.

Mr. HOLMAN. I designed to add before taking my seat that this suggestion came from the gentleman from New York himself. While Cape Haytien was the post of the consul, it is manifest when we abolish the office of minister resident the principal point of the consul-general should be at Port au Prince. The suggestion of the gentleman from New York is correct.

The amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

URUGUAY.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add "Hawaiian Islands; Honolulu." The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLASS VI.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Cork; Dublin; Prescott; Port Sarnia; Windsor, (Canada West;) Saint John's, (Canada East;) Barbadoes; Fort Erie; Coaticook; Nassau, (New Providence;) Cardiff; Port Louis, (Mauritius;) Bermuda.

Mr. HALE. I move to insert after Great Britain "Pictou." I wish to make an appeal to the committee. I move to insert "Pictou" for this reason, and I ask the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Indiana especially to consider the reasons I give for this amendment. If gentlemen on the other side, who seem to be voting in solid column, see fit to reject it, I must submit. Picton, in Nova Scotia, has always been in the old bill in this class. The pay is small; it is next to the lowest class. We have a considerable coal trade there, but still I am bound to admit the fees are not very large. It was probably because of that this was struck out.

probably because of that this was struck out.

This place raises another question, and that is this: it lies right in the track of our great fishing fleet. It is the place to which our fishermen resort in times of peril and wreck. It is the place to which they are constantly resorting and imploring interposition of the American consul paid out at different times for the relief of wrecked American consul paid out at different times for the relief of wrecked American consul paid out at different times for the relief of wrecked American consul paid out at different times for the relief of wrecked American seamen who had been driven there by wind and wave $2,979.73. This raises the simple question whether it is worth while to abolish this consulate simply because the fees do not pay for its being maintained. It would be an abandonment, so far as this case is concerned, of the time-honored principle of the American Government to maintain at such ports consuls who shall contribute to the relief of our wrecked seamen. I have a deep interest, representing as I do a dis-wrecked seamen. I have a deep interest, representing as I do a district which sends out hundreds and thousands of fishermen every year, in having the question settled here now.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me ask the gentleman from Maine how far Pictou is from Charlottetown, in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. HALE. I do not know the exact distance. These distances are all great. A wreck which would send seamen into Pictou would not be benefited by Charlottetown any more than Boston, because there is no connection between them. One place may be on one headland and another sixty miles off, with the Bay of Fundy intervening. I do not say this is the case here, but that is so with these different ports. The consulate at Pictou is able to furnish relief to wrecked American seamen. seamen

Mr. RANDALL. There was a large falling off in the receipts at the onsulate of Pictou between 1872 and 1874.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman is speaking of fees.

Mr. RANDALL. I was going on to say, as there had been so great a falling off in the receipts, the committee thought it best to remit this consulate to fees. In 1872 the receipts were $750, while for the latter year they were only a little over $500, so far as my recollection

Mr. HALE. That is because the coal trade has fallen off, and for that very reason, the fees being so small, you cannot get a responsible man for fees alone. I hope the committee will let this consulate stand as it is.

The committee divided; and there were ayes 73, noes 85.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the following amendment, to come in after "Bermuda," in line 151: "Quebec; Goderich."

The amendment was agreed to. The following paragraph was read:

FRENCH DOMINIONS.

Nice. Martinique.

Mr. HUNTON. I offer the following amendment:

Insert at end of line 153 the word "La Rochelle."

I find that La Rochelle is an important point, and I think the consulate there ought not to be abolished. The report of the consul for the year ending September 30, 1874, shows that the value of articles exported from that district for that year amounted to $1,784,939. I find, Mr. Chairman, that the consul at Cork is retained, and for the same year the exports to the United States from that district amounted only to $114,374. At Dublin, where the consul is retained, they amounted in the same year to £187,160 4s. 6d. The consuls at these two points are retained in the bill, while the consulate at La Rochelle is abolished. It appears from this book that it is the most important of the three, and I will ask that it may be inserted in the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope not. I see no necessity for amending the bill in this respect.

The amendment was not agreed to. The following paragraph was read:

Venezuela, Laguayra

Mr. KASSON. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will give me his attention for a moment, or the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Singleton] who reported the bill, I wish to say to them that I have found nowhere in the bill Beirut, in Syria, in the Turkish Dominions. I wish to know if it has been omitted intentionally by the committee, as, if so, I desire to ask his attention to the propriety of restoring it. I think this is the class, class 7, in which it priety of restoring it. I think this is the class, class?, in which is should be found.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It belonged originally in class 5 following "Danish dominions," but was dropped.

Mr. KASSON. Then I move to insert after "Larguaya" these words: "Turkish dominions; Beirut."

Beirut is, as gentlemen will remember, the sea terminus of the old wagon-road beginning at the sea and leading to Damascus; so that all commercial transportation, whatever it is, and it is not large, must all commercial transportation, whatever it is, and it is not large, must pass to the sea at Beirut. An immense number, also, of American travelers go by that road when visiting the Holy Land and other parts of Syria. There is an American college, also, at Beirut, endowed munificently by American Christianity. There are several missionary establishments at Beirut, which make it the center of missionary operations in that region. In the mountains back of Beirut are three missions conducted by Americans, whose lives are at the mercy of the inissions conducted by Americans, whose rives are at the heavy of the flerce—gentlemen can scarcely realize how flerce—fanaticism of the Mussulmans of the Ottoman Empire. It was right in sight of Beirut that the fearful massacre occurred a few years ago of Christians; near it those terrible strifes between the Druses and Christians have taken place in which so many Christians have lost their lives.

It is most vital that we should make provision for the protection of interests there which we cannot ignore and ought not to ignore, involving the lives of American citizens, and I therefore specially ask the Committee on Appropriations to give their concurrence to my motion, or at least allow the sense of the House to be taken upon it without interposing opposition. What I have said is not merely from my reading, but is largely from personal knowledge. I do not know who the consul is. I have not the slightest personal acquaintance with him. I speak purely and exclusively for the important interests I have indicated, protection being absolutely needed for those interests. Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee on Appropriations regard this particular point in the Turkish dominions as being of no more importance as a consulate than multitudes of others. The information gathered by the committee respecting this consulate would place it with a great number of points which it might be convenient, if the nation had unlimited resources for such a purpose, to establish as agencies or consulates. It is of no importance, my friend is aware, agencies of constrates. It is of no importance, my friend is aware, in a commercial point of view. The whole fees for a year have never exceeded two or three hundred dollars. Last year they were $224.80. There may be occasional travelers who might be protected by a consulthere; but the same might be said of almost any of the cities spread over the face of that country. The adventurous American traveler is everywhere. We take it for granted that the President of the United States will see that so far as it may be necessary there will be a consular agent at such a point as that, receiving, as in multitudes of other cases, such fees as the consulate will pay. But my friend will see that it is impossible, without stretching our expenditures even far beyond what has ever occurred before, to provide consuls to all these comparatively unimportant points, where our people have no commerce

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to say this: It is not worthy of us to deal in those generalities. He and I know that a good many consulates may be dispensed with and a good many cannot be. My point is on this one place, Beirut, for which I have made a plea, and I ask him if the considerations I have stated are not im-

Mr. HOLMAN. There are American travelers to be found everywhere, but of course we cannot establish consulates everywhere that Americans think proper to travel. But if they go on commercial missions, we will try to protect their commercial interests.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I did not propose, Mr. Chairman, to say another word on any of the items of this bill except to suggest to the committee points where I thought it was open to improvement, but I must say in regard to Beirut that I have received letters from New York since this bill has been under consideration, begging me if possible to get the consulate at Beirut retained, because it is the great protection for American Christians who are endeavoring to evangelize the country around about. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] said that he did not know who was the consul there, nor do I, sir, but I know that James Augustus Johnson, who is now the law partner of William Walter Phelps, formerly a distinguished member of the House, was consul, and that he concurs in the necessity of continuing the existence of this consulate. I know, also, that the son of William E. Dodge, of New York, once one of the most respected members of this House, has given the best years of his life as a missionary there, and I know that a college has been founded there by Christopher R. Roberts, of New York, with a large endowment, all of which might be wiped out at a moment's notice unless protected in case of insurrection by the consul of the United States

Sir, I do not ask gentlemen on this side of the House to vote for Christianity, but I do say that it would be a very serious calamity to the democratic party in the city of New York to lose the Presbyterian

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. May I ask the gentlemen of the committee whether they propose to make any provision for a consul at Copenhagen† because, if they do, here is the proper part of the bill to We have consolidated the ministers to Denmark, Norway and Sweden, and we have made no provision for a consul on the mainland of Denmark. Will the gentlemen on the committee tell me whether they propose to provide a consul for the mainland at Denmark? If not I will offer an amendment.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to insert at the end of line 191 the word "Talcahuano," and I will simply say that it raises the same points that were raised with reference to Pictou. It is one of the most important ports on the Chilian coast. In the year 1873 the American consul, whom it is proposed to abolish by this bill, sport to relief of distributed American consul, whom it is proposed to abolish by this bill, sport to relief of distributed American consul, whom it is proposed to abolish by this bill, sport to relief of distributed American consults. for relief of distressed American seamen the sum of $3,347, and in 1874 the sum of $3,590 It is a port to which our seamen resort more than to Valparaiso, the consulship of which has been retained in this bill. The needs are great for the whaling business on the Pacific coast, as is proved by these expenditures of the consul at this port.

Sir, I had so little luck in presenting the case of Pictou, which involved the same considerations, that I do not choose to take up more of the time of the committee, and, unless some other gentlemen desire to be heard, I ask for a vote upon the amendment.

Mr. CRAPO. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment ought to be of the commerce at this point. The reason that was urged yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was that in the changed condition of the whaling business San Francisco had become practically the only rendezvous of the whaling-fleet on the Pacific Ocean. This, sir, is erroneous. There are two classes of whalers in the Pacific. First, the North Pacific whalers who cruise in the North Pacific and Arctic Oceans. The vessels engaged in this branch of business all recruit partially at San Francisco and partially at Honelulu. Honolulu.

But there is another class of whalers in the Pacific Ocean which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] seems to have entirely forgotten: that is the sperm-whale fishery, requiring a different trainforgotten: that is the sperm-whale issiery, requiring a different training, education, and cruising-grounds. There are at this time in the Pacific Ocean, cruising off the coast of Chili, and on the line and around the Gallapagos Islands, from twenty to twenty-five whale-ships, the natural port of entry for which for recruiting and supplies is Talcahuano. There is property invested in that business to the amount of about a million dollars, and there are employed from six to eight hundred American search and as often as once in its cruisle. eight hundred American seamen, and as often as once in six or eight months they are required to go into the port of Talcahuano for the purposes of their voyages. These ships are fitted out on the Atlantic coast for voyages of four years' duration, and as often as about once in six months they must seek a port for recruits, supplies, and liberty for their men.

Now the natural port on that coast for that industry is Talca-It seems to me there is very little real economy in the abolition of that consulate. It is a consulate that costs but $1,000 or $1,500 a year, and the fees are from $500 to $700 a year. There are from six hundred to eight hundred or one thousand American seamen who need the services of an American consul at that point. There are men to be discharged, new men to be shipped, and sick and disabled seamen to be sent home. Our commerce requires the protection of an American consul at that point.

In this business there are certain burdens which we must necessarily assume. When our whalers go into the port of Talcahuano and any of the men are discharged either because of sickness or by mutual consent, the masters of our ships are required by law to pay $30 in gold for each man so discharged. And if any of our ships touch there gold for each man so discharged. And if any of our ships touch there on their way home, as they do to recruit for the home passage, they are required by law to take all the sick and disabled seamen there and transport them to the United States, a distance of 15,000 miles, boarding them for five or six months; and when they are landed on the wharf at New Bedford we get $10 each. That is one of the burdens, but we do not complain of it. But we do think that, considering the large amount of property in those waters and the large number of American seamen there requiring protection, we should have the benefit of a consul on that coast. the benefit of a consul on that coast.

Mr. RANDALL. I know that Talcahuano is the port to which whalers formerly went, as I said yesterday, as a place of refuge and supply. But our information was that our whalers new recruit and rendezvous at San Francisco. And the class of whalers to which the gentleman alludes is very small.

Mr. HALE. The figures I have given for the last year show that Talcahuano is a place to which whalers do resort, for the amount expended there for the relief of American seamen is more than at any other port on that coast.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the old whaling-port, I know; but the whaling-vessels do not now go so far south, but they go into San Francisco. However, I am not very tenacious about the matter, although a consular agent there will answer all necessary purposes. Mr. HALE. The proof that they do go in there is found in the figures I have given for last year.

Mr. CRAPO. Where is provision made for a consular agent at Talcahuano?

Mr. RANDALL. Under the law the President can appoint a consular agent or other consular officer there, and provide that he shall receive the fees.

Mr. CONGER. There is collected every year from the wages of seamen who serve in those seas and who may enter that port somewhere in the neighborhood of $4,500, at the rate of forty cents a month from their wages all the time they serve as seamen. The obmonth from their wages all the time they serve as seamen. The object of that money is to provide for their safety in foreign ports, and, if need be, for their return home from those ports. If this consulate shall be abolished there will be no place where these seamen can go and receive back what they have paid to the Government to be distributed by their consuls in the ports to which they may go, in their care, in case of sickness, or for their return to the United States. It is not appropriating the money of the United States to pay an officer there; it is but repaying to the sailor the tax of forty cents a month which we impose upon him as a sailor, and which he is entitled to receive wherever he may be sick or disabled.

The question was then taken on the amendment moved by Mr. HALE; and it was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 66, noes 87.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and under the head of "Schedule C" read the following:

adopted upon sound business principles. The recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations for the abolition of this consulate I think is founded upon ignorance and misapprehension of the extent nevertheless the name of this place is "Lauthala," and not "Ova-lau." There are two islands, as I understand, one of which is the island of Lauthala, which has a port called "Lauthala." Ovalau is unknown in the State Department; they have never heard of it. I have no doubt the Committee on Appropriations are better informed than I am on this subject. But I must call their attention to the fact that there is no such place as Ovalau, the one named in this bill.

Mr. KASSON. I beg to remind gentlemen that this change was made about a year ago; Lauthala is the name of the port, and Ovalau is not.

The amendment of Mr. Hewitt, of New York, was not agreed to.
Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend by inserting after the word "year," in line 227, the following:

For clerk for the consul at St. John's, New Brunswick, $600, while the present incumbent holds the office, and no longer.

Amend also by inserting "six hundred" after the word "thousand" in the same

Mr. RANDALL. The committee make no objection to this amendment. The consul at that place has lost his right arm.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of the marshals for the consular courts in Japan and China, Siam, and Turkey, including loss by exchange, $7,700.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee in what part of his bill, if any, there is an appropriation for paying the salaries of consular officers not citizens of the United States. It usually comes in at this point. Is there such a provision in the bill?

Mr. SINGLETON. No, sir.

Mr. KASSON. Then I would be glad to call the attention of the committee to the necessity of a provision of this kind. For the purpose of saying properly what I have to say, I move to amend by inserting after the clause last read the following:

For the payment of consular officers not citizens of the United States, $10,000.

This is the usual amount. I will state the reason for the amendment. When a consul dies or is under disability, a vice-consul or other person not a citizen of the United States may discharge the other person not a citizen of the United States may discharge the duties of the office, and he is entitled to pay. But under the construction of the Treasury Department, the appropriations made directly for consuls cannot be disbursed in that way, because they can be paid only to citizens of the United States. Hence the necessity for a specific appropriation for the payment of consular officers not citizens of the United States. Without such an appropriation these persons cannot be paid. This provision does not increase the expense at all; it only names the fund out of which payment is to be made at all, it only hames the fund out of which payment is to be made under exising law.

Mr. HOLMAN. We understand that a small sum is required for this purpose, and we had supposed that a provision of that kind was already in the bill; but we are not informed that so large a sum as $10,000 will be necessary.

Mr. KASSON. It may not be; but it will not be expended if it is

Mr. HOLMAN. Our experience is that whatever is appropriated for purposes of this kind is generally expended.

Mr. CONGER. The amount actually expended last year was $5,839.07. Of course no more will be expended under the appropriation than comes under the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the amount of the appropriation be fixed at $8,000.

Mr. KASSON. I will not make a point with the gentleman. This is all regulated by law. If the gentleman suggests $8,000, let that Mr. CONGER. I suggest $9,000, as the amount actually expended last year was $8,839.

Mr. HOLMAN. But in this bill we make some reductions in the consular service.

Mr. KASSON. I suppose I must yield $900 of the amount actually expended last year, in order to accomplish the object. I modify my amendment in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment, as modified, was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For loss by exchange on consular service, $15,000.

For loss by exchange on consular service, $15,000.

Mr. CONGER., I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the amount appropriated for this item last year and in former years was $48,000. Are they able to inform the House that $15,000 will be sufficient to meet this loss by exchange?

Mr. SINGLETON. The whole amount paid on this score last year was $3,165.76. I am instructed by the committee to move an amendment to strike out "15" and insert "10," so as to make the amount of this appropriation $10,000. After the committee had agreed upon the allowance named in the bill they received the information which I have just laid before the House as to the expenditure last year; hence we deem it proper to move this amendment, which allows more than the amount that was actually expended last year.

Mr. KASSON. I hope my friend from Mississippi is able to guarantee that the rate of exchange will remain the same. As he is aware, tee that the rate of exchange will remain the same. As he is aware, it has always been deemed necessary to allow a margin.

Mr. SINGLETON. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] can guarantee that the rate of exchange will not be less, perhaps we can come to some agreement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of prisons for American convicts in Turkey, and for wages of keepers of the same, including loss by exchange, $2,000.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "$2,000" and inserting "$1,600."

I have before me a report from the First Comptroller's Office of the Treasury Department, showing that for the service named in this and several succeeding paragraphs—rent of prisons for American convicts—the amount paid out last year was $16,014.17.

According to the bill as it now stands it amounts to upward of $19,000. We propose to reduce on these several items from 10 to 20 per cent., which will bring it down to $16,050, and leave it still in excess of what was expended last year. These reductions are based upon the report from the First Comptroller's Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of prison for American convicts in China, $1,500.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move to strike out "$1,500" and in lieu thereof to insert "$1,360."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For wages of keepers, care of offenders, and expenses, $10,000.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move to strike out "$10,000" and in lieu thereof to insert "$8,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of prison for American convicts in Japan, $750.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move to strike out "$750" and insert "$650."
Mr. KASSON. Is this not the prison for which a fixed rate of rent has been fixed by the State Department? There is such a case where they have made a contract and of course we must be guided by that Mr. SINGLETON. This is not the case.

Mr. KASSON. Why is this appropriation reduced?
Mr. SINGLETON. Because the estimate of the Treasury Depart. ment for these five paragraphs the gentleman will find, if he will turn to the report of the First Comptroller, is $16,014.17.

Mr. KASSON. Do I understand that the amount spent for American offenders and convicts in prisons in Japan came to no more than 650 last year?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. In making the reduction in every one of these cases the gentleman will discover that it is very different from reducing in the aggregate. While the aggregate may not be in excess, fixing the amount in each particular instance, it may be found, while they may be less in some, in others they may be rather beyond the amount ap-

Mr. SINGLETON. We find the estimates are furnished in solido, asking for $16,014.17, without going into any detail whatever.
Mr. KASSON. I suggest, instead of making separate items in each one of these cases, that the appropriation be made for the aggregate sum. Otherwise the service may be very much embarrassed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For wages of keepers, care of offenders, and expenses, $5,000.

Mr. SINGLETON, I move to strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For bringing home from foreign countries persons charged with crimes, and exenses incidental thereto, including loss by exchange, $5,000.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move to strike out "$5,000" and in lieu thereof to insert "$3,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, $60,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move in line 272 to strike out "sixty" and insert "ninety;" so it will read:

For relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, $90,000.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it would be difficult for the committee to explain the large reduction made in this item. Last year we appropriated $100,000. It has been stated by some one during the depropriated $100,000. It has been stated by some one during the debate on this bill that very great embarrassments will ensue if a sufficient amount of money be not appropriated to meet the consular drafts which are drawn upon the Treasury for the support and sending home of American seamen. It will be seen at once that consuls abroad will impose upon shipmasters who are compelled under the law to take a discharged sailor and receive but $15 for taking him home, unless there be a sufficient amount appropriated.

But, Mr. Chairman, there can possibly be no loss to the Government by appropriating an amount precessary to meet these drafts. It is not by appropriating an amount necessary to meet these drafts. It is not like a contingent item. Consuls do not have the handling of this money. It is merely so much money appropriated to meet consular drafts. One hundred thousand dollars was appropriated last year; only $60,000 is in this bill.

I desire to know from the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] who has charge of this bill, whether he is able to state how much of the $100,000 appropriated last year has been expended? I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will not take the floor now, but when the gentleman's five minutes have expired, I will take the floor in my own right.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will only add, Mr. Chairman, that this looks toward the humane side of the consular system. There are in every toward the numane side of the consular system. There are in every foreign country more or less of American seamen who have been discharged. They are poor, without friends, often without clothing, and they make their way to the American consul. Many have been left behind, perhaps in a row in the port where their vessels stopped, without means to get home. The Government, in protection of American commerce, has provided heretofore, humanely and wisely, that these discharged and poor American seamen, found in various ports of the world, shall be brought back to their homes. It is in our interests that they should come back to re-enlist and again enter the service. I do hope this committee will appropriate a sufficient sum of money to meet this humane side of the consular system; and therefore, in order that there may be no embarrassment on this score, I have moved to increase the appropriation from $60,000 to $100,000.

Mr. SINGLETON. When the gentleman from Ohio, the day before yesterday, was making his speech, and asserted that the amount of money expended in bringing home those seamen had never come down as low as $60,000, I proposed to read a letter from the First Comptroller of the Treasury, which showed an altogether different state of things. I propose to have read new that letter, which shows upon its face how much money has been expended in this way for the last four or five years.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 8, 1876.

SIR: In answer to your inquiry, made through a messenger, I have to state that the amounts drawn against the appropriation for relief of seamen are as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872 $216, 675 65. 242 88

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873 59, 699 15.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, as far as adjusted at the Treassury $30, 844 10.

During 1872 the great disaster to the whaling-fleet occurred, and the cost of bringing home seamen was large, as were also board, clothing, and hospital charges. I would further state that the appropriations made by Congress for relief of seamen for said years are as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872 $100,000 00 For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873 100,000 00 For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873 100,000 00 For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874 100,000 00 For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875 100,000 00

For the sear 1872, in addition to the above appropriation of $100,000, an additional appropriation of $100,000 was made to supply the deficiency, making $200,000 appropriated for that year. The excess of expenditure for that year over and above this sum ($16,675.65) was paid from extra wages received during that fiscal year.

I am, sir, very respectfully yours,

Hon. S. J. RANDALL, Ohairman of Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. SINGLETON. It will be found, therefore, from the statement of the Comptroller there that last year the amount did not reach $40,000.

Mr. KASSON. The Comptroller gives a statement of the accounts so far as adjusted. They are not yet fully adjusted.

o far as adjusted. They are not yet fully adjusted.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish to know when the adjustment is to

Mr. KASSON. When the bills come in from all over the world.
Mr. HALE. Let me suggest another thing to the gentleman from Mississippi. I think the figures he has given only include what was expended for relief, and that the transportation, amounting to about $12,000 in addition, should be reckoned besides that. The gentleman's figures are correct so far as he goes, so far as the accounts have come in, and correct so far as they apply to relief, but not to the transportation item.
Mr. SINGLETON.

At all events, taking the two years preceding that, it did not reach $60,000 a year.
Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. CONGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to renew the amendment, if the gentleman from Minnesota will withdraw it.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to its being withdrawn.
Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the amendment by making the amount $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, I have a carefully prej ared statement from the Department, of the expenses of the last four years prior to the year 1875, and while they correspond with those reported as the expenditures for relief to the seamen, there is an additional expense for passage-money home, which is not included in the amount stated by the genmoney home, which is not included in the amount stated by the gentleman from Mississippi, and in seeking to ascertain what has been the actual expense in the whole four years prior to the present fiscal year, I find by this statement from the Fifth Auditor's report that the amount expended for relief, by way of subsistence, to seamen for several years past has been as follows:

In 1871 the amount was $61,429; in 1872, $179,147; in 1873, $59,950; in 1874, $53,794. There should be added to that the actual expenses for two parts of the parts of the second state of the state of the second state.

for transportation home during those years as follows: In 1871, $8,751; in 1872, $12,069; in 1873, $11,019; in 1874, $10,095—making for those items, including what the gentleman stated and the expenses of passage home, an aggregate as follows: For 1871, $70,180; for 1872, $191,000; for 1873, $70,970; for 1874, $63,890.

Now, there is no year of those four years but the expenditure has exceeded that of any year, even the smallest, the appropriation made by the committee, by nearly $4,000.

Now, I desire to say in this connection that there is paid into the Now, I desire to say in this connection that there is paid into the relief fund for American seamen, of which this payment forms a part, by a tax of forty cents a month on every seaman's wages, which he is compelled to pay, although it is paid in the first instance by the vessel-masters, the sum of $338,893. That was the amount in the last fiscal year. The money appropriated in this bill is the forty cents a month taken from the wages of every seaman in the United States on the high seas or our inland lakes and inland rivers. It is the only return the sailors have for this $339,000 which they pay. The relief return the sailors have for this $339,000 which they pay. The relief they receive from consuls and their return to the United States, the relief they receive in the marine hospitals of the United States, all the expenditures in this direction, are not equal to the amount that is received from them; and I submit to the House whether they will make so small an appropriation of the money retained from the hard earnings of the sailors as will prevent their being relieved in foreign ports and prevent their being returned to their homes when they are sick and disabled, when their own money, and not taxation from the people, furnishes abundant means for that purpose.

Now, sir, the law makes it the duty of every consul appointed by the United States to take, receive, care for, relieve, and send home every such destitute seaman. He is bound to do it, and he draws his draft against this fund in the Treasury. If that draft be dishonored in one instance in our foreign ports, he fails to have the power to return disabled and destitute seamen to their country and to their homes. There is no loss in this case, if the appropriation should exceed the amount that would be expended in a year, for, by the very terms of the law governing these appropriations if not expended in terms of the law governing these appropriations, if not expended in the year for which they are made, they are covered into the Treasury.

I add as part of my remarks the following connected statement of the matter. The bill provides "For the relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, $30,000." The law makes it incum-American seamen who shall be destitute. He is compelled by law to afford relief, consisting of subsistence, clothing, medical attendance, and transportation to the United States, to all destitute seamen who may be entitled thereto. Seamen being destitute are entitled to these services at the consul's hands. The Revised Statutes, section 4577, provide that-

It shall be the duty of consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and vice-commercial agents, from time to time, to provide for the seamen of the United States who may be found destitute within their districts, respectively, sufficient subsistence and passage to some port in the United States in the most reasonable manner, at the expense of the United States, subject to such instructions as the Secretary of State shall give.

The amounts expended for the relief, by way of subsistence, &c., of seamen, taken from the Fifth Auditor's reports for several years past, have been as follows:

1872
1873	59, 950	46
1874	53, 794	27

To these sums must be added the actual expenses for transportation home, as follows, during those years:

1872	. 12,069	20
1873
1874	. 10,095	81
making, as the expenses for relief of seamen for the years-
1871	$70, 180	79

It will be seen that the appropriation, therefore for the relief and protection of American seamen is entirely inadequate. In 1872, there being some very tempestuous weather and the number of seamen being some very tempestuous weather and the number of seamen falling upon the hands of the consuls being unusually large, the appropriation was also inadequate, and numbers of consular drafts were protested for non-payment. A like consequence will probably follow with such an appropriation as is here proposed. As the law imposes on the consul the obligation to expend the money and as a failure in the appropriation would cause the protest of consular drafts, the bill places the consular officers of the United States at numberless consular in the application of having sold drafts which would be one. sulates in the condition of having sold drafts which would be protested and injure their credit and the credit of the country. The whole thing would simply end finally in the passage of a deficiency bill after all this odium had been incurred. It is not possible to decrease the expenditures on this head if shipwrecks and disasters rendered distinctly appropriate the expenditures of the expenditures. der additional payment necessary. The amount of the expenditure depends entirely upon these disasters; but making so inadequate an appropriation would also necessarily cause a protest of consular

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Michigan allow me to call his attention to the fact that we desire to appropriate every dollar required for this purpose, but that the Secretary of State informs us that for the year 1873 the amount expended for this

Mr. CONGER. There are two items, and you have only one of them; one is for the subsistence of sick and disabled seamen abroad and the other for their transportation home.

Mr. HOLMAN. The provision made in this bill is "for the relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, $60,000," and the inquiry made was, how much had been expended heretofore under that appropriation, which amounted annually to $100,000. The answer was as follows: "In answer to your inquiry, made through a messenger, I have to state that the amounts drawn against the appropriation for relief of seamen are as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872. $216, 675 65
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873. 56,242 88
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874. 59, 699 15
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, as far as adjusted at the Treas-

Now the bill as it stands appropriates $90,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. O. no; it appropriates only $60,000, and we are trying to make it $90,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is correct; the bill appropriates $60,000, being at the date of this letter, February 8, 1876, in excess of the amount expended for the last fiscal year. After seven or eight the amount expended for the last fiscal year. After seven or eight months of the year had expired the whole amount expended was $39,844.10, and in neither of the two preceding years did the amount run up to as much as $60,000.

Now, while we are willing to appropriate as much as is required, we deem it unwise to appropriate a dollar beyond what is a tually required for the purpose.

Mr. CONGER. Add to that $11,019 for transportation, and $10,095 in 1875, and the gentleman's figures will agree with mine. I withdraw the amendment.

draw the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew the amendment. I desire to say that when I was in the midst of my remarks the other day the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Singleton] desired to read this letter which bas now been twice read within a few moments, to correct the statement which I was making. That letter has now been read; the shell has exploded in the House, and with what effect? The answer is complete and overwhelming, made by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. Conger.] An answer that no gentleman can fail to see is a perfectly conclusive and unanswerable one. My figures were given by the Secretary of State, who has the accounts of both items, namely, for the relief of seamen and for the transportation of them home, both for the relief of seamen and for the transportation of them home, both of which came under the head of this appropriation.

Mr. SINGLETON. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to state that the books are kept at the State Department?

Mr. GARFIELD. I say that his books give a complete account of all expenditures under both heads. Now, what did the Committee on Appropriations do? They went to the Comptroller, or rather sent a messenger there and asked for the expenditures under the relief fund. Well, they got their answer, but they failed to inquire also for the expenditures for the transportation of seamen home; if they had the expenditures for the transportation of seamen home; if they had asked that question they would have got exactly my figures.

Mr HOLMAN. It is all covered by the same appropriation.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Michigan has given the figures under the other items. Now, I hold in my hand a report of the Secretary of State, which is in print and before the House, and which says that in the year 1874 the sum of $63,593.08 was paid for these two purposes out of this one appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, this bill appropriates $60,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. My statement therefore was absolutely correct, Mr. GARFIELD. My statement therefore was absolutely correct, that in no one year for the last fourteen years have the expenditures gone below the amount which the gentleman now proposes to appropriate. Furthermore, I am here to state on official figures that for the last fourteen years the expenditures have amounted to $120,000. It occasionally went away up. I wish it might go down below $60,000. But I ask, gentlemen, is it safe to neglect the law of averages? Ought we not to appropriate a sum at least equal to the averages of recent years? The Committee on Appropriations have reported $4,000 less than the average has been for twenty years past. Is that safe? Is that wise? We should appropriate enough to meet the ordinary expenditure for this purpose according to the average for the past twenty

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman must see that it was less than $40,000

Mr. GARFIELD. What is the gentleman talking about? It takes six months for these accounts to come in.

Mr. HOLMAN. And those six months have already expired. Mr. GARFIELD. The very report you read from says "as far as

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. I say that it takes much more than the time that has already elapsed for these returns to come in.

Mr. HOLMAN. Since the 30th of June last?

Mr. GARFIELD. I say the gentleman cannot tell, no man can tell, what the expenditures for last year were until the accounts of the consuls in all parts of the world have come in and the records have been made up. Mr. RANDALL. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the report of Mr. Keim in connection with this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indeed, the most interesting feature of my investigation was the ingenuity displayed by consular officers since the act of 1856 particularly in defrauding the Government. Great frauds are practiced in the disbursement of the fund for the relief of American seamen in foreign ports. There is no branch in the consular service subject to greater abuse than the administration of these humane funds. Vouchers have been paid by the ream when the Treasury officers believed that they were questionable. There is, however, no law which authorizes an officer to dispute an account that is in due form, and against which no circumstantial objection can be found.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that $60,000 is enough, when we take into consideration this statement.

Mr. CONGER. Who is the writer of that?
Mr. RANDALL. One of your own officers, appointed by President Grant.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman name some one case of fraudulent vouchers

Mr. RANDALL. I have named what he states.

Mr. GARFIELD. Name the case.
Mr. RANDALL. It is not my business to do it.
Mr. GARFIELD. Why did he not do it?
Mr. RANDALL. He has examined the subject, and as an officer of our own appointment he makes this statement.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. Garfield to make the sum $100,000, and it was not agreed to. The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Dunnell to make the sum $90,000; and it was not agreed to upon a division—ayes

70, noes 101. Mr. DUNNELL. I give notice that I will renew the amendment in the House if I have the opportunity.

Mr. CONGER. In order that I may test the sense of the committee upon the proposition I make, I move to increase the sum to $75,000. I have no desire to appropriate one cent more than the necessities of the case require. I do say, however, that we should appropriate of the sailors' own money enough to take care of them.

Mr. RANDALL. We say that the sailors' own money ought not to be stolen.

Mr. CONGER. It ought not to be stolen, but this money is paid for drafts, which the consul is by law compelled to make. If you wish to have further accounting before that is done, then change the law. But if a draft is dishonored which any consul draws, then no more aid can be given by that consul, because he cannot procure any more money to do so. I assert that it is the duty of this Congress to take care of seamen in foreign ports as we do at home. It is our duty to give them relief and assistance and to make an appropriation sufficient to return them to their home. The sum of $75,000 will be the average for the last four years, leaving out the year in which the whalers of the Arctic Ocean suffered so much and caused such great additional expense.

I desire to have the sense of this committee on my proposition. I cannot see that there can be any reasonable objection to it. Of course it is of no interest to any one of us one way or the other, except that it is our duty to provide for seamen abroad who are left there, and that too ont of their own money.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has called for a specification. I will ask the Clerk to read one. Mr. Keim in his report states the condition in which he found the consulates with reference to the distribution of the seamen's relief fund in the South American states on the Pacific coast. One instance worthy of note, and which answers the question of the gentleman from Ohio, will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At Payta the greatest frauds have been committed for some years under the plea of relieving seamen from whale-ships. I may say it is my belief, after careful investigation, that not one voucher out of ten is an honest statement of a bona fide expenditure. The port has no trade with the United States, and the number of whale ships arriving there is small. As the town is surrounded by a desert, it furnishes neither wood nor provisions, nor even water. It will be seen, too, that the expenditures at Payta, with no commerce, exceed the port of Callao, where there is a large American trade.

Mr. GARFIELD. That does not allege one specific fact. Mr. HENDERSON. If what has just been read is an argument for Mr. HENDERSON. If what has just been read is an argument for the reduction of this appropriation, is it not equally an argument in favor of making no appropriation whatever?

Mr. SPRINGER. Not at all.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the money is going to be stolen, then we should not make any appropriation.

Mr. SPRINGER. We do not say it is stolen everywhere. We propose to make a sufficient appropriation for an honest expenditure, not for dishonest disbursements.

Mr. HENDERSON. How do we prevent fraud by cutting down the appropriation?

Mr. SPRINGER. It will require the officers to scrutinize these accounts and see what are fraudulent and what are honest, before they pay them.

Mr. HENDERSON. The reduction of the amount appropriated does not, so far as I can see, prevent fraud in the remotest degree. I repeat, that if the liability to dishonest expenditure is an argument against appropriating $75,000, it is an equally good argument against appropriating $30,000, which the committee have agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not at all.

Mr. HENDERSON. If there are frauds, why not provide some remedy to prevent them! Mr. SPRINGER.

The remedy is in the appropriating power, and we will provide for that at the proper time.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my amendment, giving notice that I shall ask a vote on the proposition in the House.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill the following:

And the salaries provided in this act for the officers aforesaid, respectively, shall be in full for the annual salaries thereof from and after the 1st day of July, 1876; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed from and after said day.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point that this is new legislation. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that under the amended

Mr. CONGER. Under the amended rule the point is that we may not only increase but decrease salaries on appropriation bills; but there was no provision made for new legislation of this kind. Besides, the proposition is not germane; it is independent legislation, changing existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not entirely clear in his remem-The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not entirely clear in his remembrance of the rule; but, if his memory is correct, the provision is that it is in order to include in the appropriation bills any legislation looking toward a reduction of expenses. The Chair therefore rules that the amendment is in order. There may be a very wide scope for reduction, but that is not the fault of the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the further point that the rule authorizes the Committee on Appropriations to report bills having in view reductions. But this is an amendment offered in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. But by instruction of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. But by instruction of the committee.
Mr. GARFIELD. But it is not reported in the bill.
The CHAIRMAN. The amendment comes from the gentleman who reported the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The language of the rule is—
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has made his ruling that the amendment is in order.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I move to amend by inserting in class 7, line 176, "Kingston, Canada." I presume there will be no objection to this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. Before the motion is made that the committee rise,
I wish to inquire whether provision has been made anywhere in this bill for payment of rent of court-house and jail at Yeddo, under an existing lease executed pursuant to a law passed two years ago. Perhaps it may be more convenient for the committee to examine the matter and allow the amendment to be offered in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The provision is not in the bill, and the committee do not desire it to be there.

Mr. KASSON. Then they repudiate the contract of the Government

Mr. RANDALL. We deemed the provision unnecessary Mr. KASSON. But the lease was made in pursuance of law.

Mr. RANDALL. Such a lease cannot be made for over a year. Mr. KASSON. Certainly the Government is bound by virtue of the act passed two years ago.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Hoskins reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. SINGLETON. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. The SPEAKER. On what amendment is a separate vote demanded? Mr. HALE. I demand a separate vote on the amendment abolishing the mission to the Hawaiian Islands.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the other amendments of the Committee of the Whole will be concurred in.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment upon which a separate vote has been asked by the gentleman from Maine [Mr.

a separate vote has been asked by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 20 the words "and the Hawaiian Islands," and insert "and" before the word "  ${\tt Venezuela}$  ."

Mr. CONGER. What will be the effect of that amendment?

Mr. CONGER. What will be the effect of that amendment?

Mr. HALE. To vote in favor of this amendment is to vote for the abolition of the Hawaiian mission, and to vote against it is to keep the mission where it now is.

Mr. STONE. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. COX. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The metion was agreed to

The motion was agreed to.

The question was taken on Mr. STONE's motion, and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HALE. I demand the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative yeas 131, nays 77, not voting 81; as follows:

During the vote, Mr. CLYMER stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. SMITH, who was necessarily absent from the House, and that, while his colleague would vote in the negative, he himself would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WALSH stated that his colleague, Mr. SWANN, was unable to attend the session of the House to-day by reason of sickness.

Mr. HILL stated that his colleague, Mr. HARRIS, was detained at his room by sickness, and that if present he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. STEVENSON stated he was paired with his colleague, Mr. HURLBUT, necessarily detained from the House, and who, if present, would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. SCHLEICHER stated that his colleague, Mr. Mills, was compelled to leave the House before the vote was taken because of sickness in his family, and that if present he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HOSKINS moved that the reading of the names be dispensed

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. Pending that motion, I move the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox in the chair.) The vote will now be taken on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOSKINS. I rise to a point of order, that the vote cannot be taken on the passage of the bill, as it has not yet been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was done by unanimous consent. Mr. HOSKINS. No; it was not.

Mr. HOSKINS. No; it was not.
Mr. RANDALL. It was passed over by unanimous consent.
Mr. BLAINE. It could not be passed over.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the bill is not now engrossed, and therefore the point of order by the gentleman from New York is well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hoskins,] I understand, calls for the reading of the engrossed bill. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FORT. That is manly; now we will get at it.

The question being taken, the vote ordering the yeas and nays was reconsidered. Mr. HOLMAN. Now I suppose the point of order is not being made on the bill itself. Mr. HALE. Let it go through without the yeas and nays. Mr. HOSKINS. I raised the point of order that the bill has not been engrossed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the Chair sustained the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. HOSKINS. But I desire to say that I do not insist on the point of order if we can pass the bill at once and go home.

Mr. RANDALL. We want the record.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the third reading and engrossment of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That has not yet been ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not understand how the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] can make a conditional objection to the engrossment of the bill. He must either object or not object.

Mr. HOSKINS. I raised the point of order, in which the Chair sustained me, that the bill has not been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the Chair to put the question whether the

Mr. HANDALL. I ask the chart to put the question whether the bill shall be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. HOSKINS. The point of order involves this point: that the third reading of the engrossed bill cannot now be had, for the reason that it is not engrossed.

Mr. RANDALL. I understood you to say that you did not make that point.

Mr. HOSKINS. I certainly do.
Mr. LAWRENCE. I rise to a question of order.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his question

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is not in order to demand the reading of the engrossed bill until the House has first ordered the bill to be engrossed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill cannot be read until it is

Mr. LAWRENCE. The question now is, Shall the bill be ordered to engrossed and read the third time? When the House has decided that question, then it will be in order to demand the reading of the engrossed bill if any gentleman desires it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is that the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has this bill been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not.

Mr. McCRARY. I wish to make a suggestion to the House. I do Mr. McCkaki. I wish to make a suggestion to the House. I do not understand that any gentleman on this side of the House proposes to vote against the bill. It is necessary as a matter of course that this bill should pass. All the trouble has arisen from the call for the yeas and nays. I think that by unanimous consent this bill may now be passed, and that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hoskins] will withdraw the point of order if the demand for the yeas and nays be withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will please proceed in der. Gentlemen will take their seats.

order. Gentlemen will take their seats.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to make this parliamentary inquiry: Is not the question now pending whether this bill shall be engrossed or not?

The SPEAKER protempore. The question is, Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. HÖLMAN. I ask that that question may now be put.

The SPEAKER protempore. Is the House ready for the question?

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was ordered to be engressed and read a third time.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOSKINS. Now I make the point of order that the bill is not engrossed. I call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. RANDALL. We will have it engrossed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the last vote by which the House ordered the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to Mr. HOSKINS. I desire to withdraw the point of order I made in relation to the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana withdraw his motion to reconsider the vote ordering the engrossment and third reading of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do. The bill was then read the third time by its title.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 190, nays 2, not voting 97; as follows:

During the roll-call, Mr. STEVENSON said: On this bill I am paired with my colleague, General Hurlbut, who is necessarily detained from the House. he were here, I would vote ay, and I am inclined to think he would vote the same way. [Laughter.]

Mr. JENKS said: My colleague, Mr. Cochrane, is necessarily absent on account of the sickness of a child; if present, he would vote

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

MES-AGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 14) of the following title: "An act to extend the time for the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad."

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House adjourn, but I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CLARK, who desires to introduce a bill which it is very desirable should be printed before

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I call for the regular order.

SERVICES OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I simply desire to introduce a bill that was drawn up by the assistant attorney of the Post-Office Department in accordance with a suggestion made by the First Assistant Postmaster-General in a letter written to the Postmaster-General, and ask that the bill, with the accompanying letter, be printed.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 1993) to repeal section 11 of the act approved June 23, 1874, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department," was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and, with the accompanying letter, ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Cas-WELL for ten days, on account of important business; to Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, for five days, on account of important business; to Mr. WALLACE, of South Carolina, for three days, on account of important business; to Mr. Harris, of Massachusetts, for ten days; to Mr. Mackey, of South Carolina, for five days, and to Mr. Walling indefinitely.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the papers in the case of R. B. Ferguson; and the same were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HOLMAN. To accommodate two or three gentlemen who have bills to introduce, I am willing to yield. Mr. HOAR. I call for the regular order of business. There is no quorum in the House.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. We have been kept here an hour in order to get the yeas and nays, and gentlemen must not find fault if I insist on the regular order.

The question was taken on Mr. Holman's motion, and it was agreed to; and accordingly (at six o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. SARGENT. I present several petitions, numerously signed, from citizens of the State of California who say that, considering the importance to the welfare of their State and to the country at large of a line of railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific south of the snow line, which at all times and in all seasons shall be open for the wants of Government as well as the uses of commerce, "we earnestly and respectfully petition your honorable bodies to grant to the Texas and Pacific Railway Company such aid as will secure an early completion of that road to the Pacific Ocean, and ask at your hands such legislation as will accomplish that result." They submit that "the single artery of railroad communication between California and the East is even now barely sufficient for the increased and rapidly growing commerce of the Pacific coast, and even if free from snow would soon become utterly unequal to the task of supplying the wants of the West and South." They believe "that a railway route opening to commerce the vast mineral and agricultural resources of this southern belt, with its climatic advantages, is a great national necessity, and will, by securing competition, cheapen transportation, refive the drooping industries of the country, and be of incalculable benefit to the whole people." I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY presented the petition of the Walla Walla Grange, of Washington Territory, praying Congress to cause a canal to be constructed at the Cascades of the Columbia River, in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of 819 citizens, who are residents and qualified electors in the counties of Columbia and Walla Walla, in Washington Territory, praying Congress to annex those counties to the State of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Terri-

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Isaac E. Higgins, of Washington Territory, praying compensation for his land claim in Whatcom, Washington Territory, of which he was dispossessed by the military authorities of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. I have received from the Land Reform Association of New York a remonstrance containing many reasons why section 2303 of the Revised Statutes, sometimes known as the southern homestead act, should not be repealed. This memorial is embellished with a photograph of the association, I suppose as a guarantee of good faith. As the bill is before the Senate, I move that the remonstrance lie upon the table. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of Samuel P. Holt, of Lynchburgh, Virginia, praying compensation for services as an assistant assessor and gauger for the first division of the fifth district of Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of Commander George A. Stevens, praying the passage of a bill authorizing the President to nominate and, by and with the advice of the Senate, appoint him as a eaptain on the active list of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ENGLISH presented the petition of James C. Welling and others, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying that books in other than the English, Latin, and Greek languages be admitted free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, asking an appropriation for the removal of obstructions to navigation in the Missouri and Yellowstone Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Com-

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, requesting of Congress legislative action to declare forfeited the land grant in aid of the construction of railroads from Leaven-worth to the southern line of the State of Kansas in the direction of Galveston Bay, in Texas.

Mr. INGALLS. That last concurrent resolution has also been forwarded to me. The subject is one of very considerable importance, and while I am not aware of the facts in the case nor whether the forfeiture has occurred or not, I think the subject requires early action by some committee of this body. I therefore move that this concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution is as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 5, relating to lands conveyed to the State of Kansas in aid of a certain railroad, and which have subsequently reverted to the United in aid of a certain railroad, and which have subsequently reverted to the United States.

Whereas by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, certain lands were granted to the State of Kansas for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from the city of Leavenworth by the way of the town of Lawrence and via the Ohio City crossing of the Osage River to the southern line of the State in the direction of Galveston Bay in Texas, with a branch from Lawrence by the valley of the Wakarusa River to a point on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad where said road intersects the Neosho River; and whereas said act contained a proviso in the words following, to wit: "That if any part of said road and branches is not completed within ten years from the passage of this act, no further sale shall be made and the land unsold shall revert to the United States;" and whereas the State of Kansas by act of Legislature approved February 9, 1864, accepted said grant and assumed the execution of the trust; and whereas the said period of ten years has elapsed and said railroad has not been completed, nor has Congress extended the time for such completion; and whereas alarge portion of land included within said grant and lying within the limits of the State of Kansas unsold and are not open to settlement; and whereas the declaration of forfeiture and assertion of ownership alone abides in the legislative authority of the Government: Therefore,

Be it revolved by the house of representatives of the State of Kansas, (the senate therian concurring.) That we respectfully request the Congress of the United States to declare said lands forfeited and to take such legislative action as may be necessary to render them subject to entry under the pre-emption and homestead laws of the United States; that we respectfully solicit our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence to secure such action as may effect the desired result; that the secretary of state is hereby instructed to furnish a copy of this pre

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the great eal of State. Done at Topeka this 3d day of February, A. D. 1876. THOS. H. CAVANAUGH, Secretary of State.

Mr. WHYTE. I present the petition of Robert C. Buchanan, colonel and brevet major-general United States Army, praying compensation for the use of his invention and the infringement of his patent-right for portable boats by the United States Army. As this petition re-lates to military affairs, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition of Martha J. Coston, praying an appropriation for the amount justly due on the manufacture by her husband of the Coston signal-lights for the use of the Navy Department; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN presented three petitions of citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, praying Congress, under proper guarantees, to extend the national credit to the completion of a great southen line to the Pacific; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of William Coventry H. Waddell, submitting a plan for a convertible United States bond, bearing a low rate of interest. This petitioner, a citizen of New York, asks me to move that this petition be printed; but knowing as I do that the judgment of the Senate is against printing memorials, I do not feel at liberty to make that request; but I move its reference to the Committee on Finance. the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of citizens of Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, and a petition of citizens of Hazleton, Pennsylvania, praying that aid be granted in the construction and completion of the Texas Pacific Railroad; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 410) for the relief of First Lieutenant George W. Wright, Seventh United States Infantry, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James L. Sherman, first lieutenant First Artillery United States Army, praying to be re-imbursed in the sum of $1,429.04 on account of a deficiency in his commissary stores while acting as commissary of subsistence, occasioned by the dishonesty of his commissary sergeant, reported adversely thereon and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 292) for the relief of Thomas Belew, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 199) for the relief of the estate of the late paymaster Major John S. Walker, United States Army, to report it without amendment with a written report thereon; and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that, being a private bill to compensate for the loss of money and property, it ought to go on the Calendar to be taken up in regular order with all other private bills.

Mr. COCKRELL. The evidence is very explicit, I will state to the enator from Ohio, and we shall save time by considering it now.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only trouble is that it may involve a precent. I think it would be better to let that class of bills go on the alendar to be taken up in regular order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have recommendations from the Secretary of War and the Paymaster-General showing that the bill ought to be

Mr. SHERMAN. No doubt the bill will be passed when it is reached in its order, but I think it had better take its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects, and the bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 435) to amend section 5546 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing for imprisonment and transfer of United States prisoners; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have here some correspondence between the Attorney-General and myself bearing upon this subject, which I ask to have printed and referred with this bill. I also move that so much of the Attorney-General's report as relates to the amendment of this of the Attorney-General's report as relates to the amendment of this section be referred to the same committee, and also that Senate Executive Document No. 13, bearing upon the same subject, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in connection with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks that the correspondence of the Attorney-General relating to the subject of the bill just introduced be printed and referred to the committee. The Chair hears no objection. He also asks the reference of a portion of the Attorney-General's report and Senate Executive Document No. 13. The Chair hears no objection, and that reference is also made.

Mr. DAWES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of William S. Robinson, of Malden, Massachusetts; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 437) for the relief of Henry C. Caldwell; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary,

Mr. INGALLS. I believe the attention of the Senate has been previously called at this session to the subject of the ravages of insects that are injurious to vegetation. I am informed that accurate information and statistics show that during the past year the actual loss to the industries of this country by the ravages of the locust, the chinch-bug, the army and cotton worm, and the Hessian fly exceed $200,000,000; that the ravages from the locust alone exceed $50,000,000. In seven counties in the State of Minnesota during the past season nearly sixty thousand bushels of locusts were destroyed at an expense to that community of nearly $80,000. It is believed that the subject is worthy the attention of Congress, and that by the use of proper means a very large proportion of this destruction can be averted and hereafter prevented. With a view to that end, I have been requested by the State entomologist of Missouri to introduce a bill, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Agriculture; and I venture to express the hope that the chairman of that committee may give it very early attention.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduced a bill (S. No. 438) for the protection of agriculture against injurious insects; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 439) for the relief of George A. Stevens; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am requested to introduce a bill by a most meritorious and gallant officer of my State.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (8. No. 440) to repeal section 2 of an act entitled "An act for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, and to fix the rank and pay of retired officers of the Army," approved March 3, 1875; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 441) to facilitate the transit of merchandise from the Dominion of Canada through the territory of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say that I introduced this bill at the request of a respectable gentleman who vouches for its merit. I do not understand its merits myself. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 442) for the relief of John Bowles, late lieutenant-colonel Seventy-ninth Regiment United States Colored Troops; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PENITENTIARY AT FORT SMITH, ARKANSAS.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a penitentiary upon the abandoned military reservation at Fort Smith, Arkansas, for the confinement of United States

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I present an order which I ask the Senate to act upon at present. It is to restore to the State Department copies of old treaties that have been on the files of the Senate for a long while without action, and it is necessary for the purpose of keeping up their records that they should be restored to the Department. I present a letter from the Secretary of State who states the reasons for this better than I can:

Peasons for this better than I can:

Ordered. That the Secretary be directed to transmit to the Secretary of State to be deposited with the archives of the State Department the following conventions and treaty heretofore transmitted to the Senate of the United States by the President of the United States and not definitively acted on:

Convention of commercial reciprocity between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, concluded at Washington the 20th day of July, 1855;

Convention between the United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty for the establishment of international copyright, concluded at Washington the 17th of February, 1853;

Treaty of amity and navigation and commerce between the United States of America and the republic of Nicaragua, concluded at the city of Leon, the 3d of September, 1849.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter of the Secretary of State will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 9, 1876.

Washington, February 9, 1876.

Sir: It is supposed that several treaties between the United States and foreign powers, which, from time to time, have been submitted by the President to the Senate, but not definitely disposed of by that body, may be among the archives of the committee of which you are chairman. Among these must be the treaty as to copyright with Great Britain, concluded by Mr. Everett when Secretary of State, some time in 1853, as is understood. The treaty concluded by Mr. Squier with Nicaragan in 1849, containing an article or articles on a ship-canal, and the reciprocity treaty with the Sandwich Islands, signed by Governor Marcy in 1855, may also be among the number.

I will thank you to cause an examination to be made on this subject and to take into consideration the expediency of moving for the return of such instruments to this Department. Their detention at the Senate usually leaves us no way of being certain as to the stipulations which they may contain.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

RAILROAD THROUGH BENICIA RESERVATION.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to take up Senate bill No. 153, reported favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs. I think it will take but a few moments to dispose of it.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 153) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the United States arsenal grounds near Benicia, California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, through the lands of the United States included in the military reservation near Benicia, in the State of California, is hereby granted to the Northern Railway Company for the purpose of constructing a railroad: Provided, That the said right of way and the width and location thereof through said lands and the regulations for operating said railroad within the limits of the reservation so as to prevent all danger to public property shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War prior to any entry on said lands or the commencement of the construction of said works: Provided, also, That whenever said rights of way shall cease to be used for the purposes aforesaid the same shall revert to the United States.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would like to suggest to the Senator from

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would like to suggest to the Senator from California to add a proviso.

Mr. SARGENT. I will state that this bill is simply that, under such regulations as may be established by the Secretary of War—the Senator will observe that the bill is very well guarded by the committee and I think the amendment in that respect is better than the original bill—there shall be a right of way through the military reservation near the Benicia arsenal. The Benicia arsenal grounds come down by a point upon the Karquenas Straits so that they shut off any access to the upper country. To surmount this by a railroad from the city of Benicia requires a grade, within a mile of ground, of from two hundred to two hundred and fifty feet. In other words, it is actually impossible. The people are isolated by that circumstance; and this bill simply gives the right to run the road along the marsh between the waters of the strait and this jutting headland. It can be no inconvenience to the Government at all. In fact an officer at the grounds told me it would be a convenience to them in transacting their business, and I can perceive no possible objection to the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The only point I had in my mind was whether Congress should not reserve in the bill the right to expel the railroad from these lands if the public interests should require it.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know that such a provision would be im-

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose the bill is all right, but I should like to

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MICHAEL W. BROCK.

Mr. KEY. I move the present consideration of Senate bill No. 165. The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 165) for the relief of Michael W. Brock, of Meigs County, Tennessee, late a private in Company D, Tenth Tennessee Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It appearing that Michael W. Brock, late a private in Company D, Tenth Tennessee Cavalry, is erroneously charged on the rolls of the company with a horse, horse-equipments, arms, &c., of the value of $225, the bill proposes to relieve him of all liability on account of these charges, and provides for correcting the record accordingly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report?

Mr. KEY. There is a written report, which can be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. Ca-

PERTON, from the Committee on Claims, on the 9th instant:

PERTON, from the Committee on Claims, on the 9th instant:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of M. W. Brock, praying to be relieved from liability for certain Government property all aged to have been taken possession of by him during the late war, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

The petitioner alleges that he enlisted as a private in Company D, Tenth Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, on Jannary I, 1864, for three years, and became thereby entitled to a bounty of $300; that in consequence of severe injuries, caused by a fall from his horse while pursuing a portion of the rebel forces, he was furloughed and allowed to go home, and was never after able to return; that his name was carried upon the rolls as a deserter; that he furnished proof showing that he did not desert, and succeeded in obtaining an honorable discharge on or about the 4th of May, 1875; that when he applied for his pay he ascertained that he was charged with the value of a horse, horse equipments, &c., amounting to $225; that he exhibited proof that be had not taken with him any of the articles charged at the time of leaving for home; that the matter having been referred to the Adjutant-General, he declined to allow any correction of the rolls to be made after so great a lapse of time.

The committee are satisfied that injustice was done the petitioner in charging him with desertion and also in charging him with the property alleged to have been a sufficient reason why the Adjutant-General should refuse the correction asked for, the committee do not regard that there was such delay as should proclude him from the relief which he now seeks. He was in no position to make his claim for his pay until he had secured his discharge, which was given him only in 1875, and it was orly then that he ascertained he was charged with the horse, equipments, &c. The committee think he is entitled to relief, and therefore report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEAVENWORTH STREET RAILROAD.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the considera-tion of Senate bill No. 25.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 25) granting the right of way to the Leavenworth Street Railroad Company across the Fort Leavenworth military reservation was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment, to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, however, That whenever said railroad shall abandon said right of way, or fail to use the same for the purposes provided in this act, then and in that case said right of way shall revert to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. SHERMAN. I move to add to that section, that Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act.
Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection.
The amendment was agreed to.
The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments was agreed to the senate as amended.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 261.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 261) to remove the political disabilities of Daniel T. Chandler, of Baltimore, Maryland, as considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

It is a direction to was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of War to amend the record of George Schwartz, late a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, by causing the charge of desertion to be removed, and a provision that his legal representatives shall be treated in respect to claims for pay, allowances, bounty, and pension the same as if the death of Schwartz had been proved to have taken place in the line of his duty and in the military service of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. CLAYTON. There is a report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CLAYTON on the 24th of January from the Committee on Military Affairs:

Ton on the 24th of January from the Committee on Military Affairs:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin and accompanying papers, asking the removal of the charge of desertion from George Schwartz, late a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

That they find that this case was before our committee at the first session of the Forty-third Congress, and that the matter was at that time fully examined, and the following report adopted:

"It is shown by the papers before the committee that George Schwartz enlisted at Waukesha, Wisconsin, in Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, in May, 1861; that he served about thirty-three months in said company and regiment, and then re-enlisted as a veteran in February, 1864, and, not being in good health at the time of said re-enlistment, he went home on a sick furloup of thirty days, which was further extended five days on account of continued illness; that upon the 9th day of April, 1864, the said Schwartz, being still unwell but anxious to rejoin his regiment, let his home in Waukesha, Wisconsin, for the purpose of regioning his regiment. At Chicago, Illinois, he procured from the proper officer an order of transportation from Chicago to Pittsburgh, and after so procuring said order of transportation and leaving Chicago the said Schwartz has never been heard from, and that he never rejoined his regiment. The papers further show that proper efforts have been made to find some trace of the said Schwartz, but have proved unavailing.

"Affidavits from responsible persons showing that said Schwartz was regarded "Affidavits from responsible persons showing that said Schwartz was regarded as an upright and honorable man are also presented.

"The captain and lieutenant of said Company F, Fifth Wisconsin Regiment Volunteers, and the major of said regiment, all testify that the said Schwartz was a faithful soldier and upright man; and the second lieutenant of Company F testifies that the charge of desertion was made against the said Schwartz simply because he did not personally appear and answer to the roll-call, as was the invariable custom. "These facts were presented to the Legislature of Wisconsin, and that body, after consideration, adopted the following memorial:

STATE OF WISCONSIN, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,

Madison, March 5, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the Legislature of this State has adopted the following memorial to Congress, No. 5, senate:

Memorial to Congress to remove the charge of desertion from George Schwartz, late private of Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully repre-

The memorial of the Legislature of the State of wisconsin respectivity represents:

That in the opinion of this Legislature, founded upon the evidence presented, and which is herewith transmitted, the charge of "desertion," which now rests upon the above-named George Schwartz on the record in the Office of the Adjutant-General of the United States, should be removed; and that as, from the peculiar circumstances of the case, it is impossible to prove the death of said George Schwartz in the manner prescribed by the Adjutant-General of the United States, therefore your memorialists respectfully ask for the passage of a special act of Congress removing the charge of "desertion" now resting upon the good name and reputation of said George Schwartz, and ordering that the military record of said George Schwartz, in the Office of the Adjutant-General of the United States, shall be so altered that it will appear of record in that Office that he died in the line of his duty and in the military service of the United States.

Approved February 26, 1874.

W. R. TAYLOR, Governor.

Hon. MATT. H. CARPENTER, United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

"After a careful examination of the papers presented, your committee are of the opinion that the relief asked should be accorded, and therefore report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage."

In this report and its recommendations your committee fully concur, and herewith report and recommend the passage of the bill (S. No. 168) without amendment. Your committee will further state that this bill passed the Senate on June 13, 1874, and was sent to the House of Representatives, where no final action was had

OREGON CENTRAL RAILROAD.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consider-Mr. MITCHELL. ation of Senate bill No. 146.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 146) extending the time for the completion of the Oregon Central Railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The time within which the Oregon Central Railroad Company was,

The time within which the Oregon Central Railroad Company was, by the sixth section of the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon," approved May 4, 1870, to complete their entire railroad and telegraph line is by the bill extended five years from its passage.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that a land-grant railroad?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir. I desire to offer an amendment which is precisely similar to the one incorporated in the Northern Pacific bill a few days since. I move to insert the following:

bill a few days since. I move to insert the following:

Provided, That this extension is granted upon the express condition and understanding that, where pre-emption and homestead claims were initiated or private entries and locations were allowed upon lands embraced in the grant to said company prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal at the respective district land offices, the land embraced in such entries shall not be held as within the grant to said company, and shall be patented to the parties lawfully entering the same, and in case of a bandonment by them, shall be open to pre-emption and homestead entry only by actual settlers. But the company shall be entitled to indemnity therefor as now provided by law.

I desire to say one word in explanation of this bill, which was reported from the Committee on Railroads. The only object of the bill is to extend the time five years from this date for the completion of this road. On the 4th of May, 1870, an act was passed making a land grant to the Oregon Central Railroad Company in aid of the construction of a railroad from Portland, Oregon, to Astoria, in that State, and also from a suitable point of junction on that road to the Yamhill River, in Oregon. The road has been completed to the junction, and has also been completed from the junction to the Yamhill River; that branch of the road is entirely completed: so that there only remain branch of the road is entirely completed; so that there only remain about eighty miles of the road to be completed. The last section of the act of May 4, 1870, provides as follows:

The act of May 4, 1010, provides as follows.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted. That the said company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior its assent to this act within one year from the time of its passage; and the foregoing grant is upon condition that said company shall complete a section of twenty or more miles of said railroad and telegraph within two years, and the entire railroad and telegraph within six years from the same date.

The time, it will be observed, expires on the 4th of May next. The only purpose of the bill is to extend the time five years. It makes no additional grant whatever. The road, as I have said, is nearly half completed. It is impossible to complete the road within the time fixed in the act, and I hope there will be no objection, as there was not in the Committee on Railroads, to the extension.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was reported in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think there ought to be added the same provision which was added to the Northern Pacific Railroad extension bill, that this legislation, as well as that which has preceded it, shall be subject to the pleasure of Congress in the way of amendment and repeal, and that the company shall assent to it by filing its assent; in other words, exactly the same provision that appears after section 4, before section 5, in the Northern Pacific bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend by inserting the following words, to come in at the end of the bill as an additional section:

SEC. —. This act shall not be construed to affect existing private rights otherwise than as hereinbefore expressly provided, and shall, as well as said charter and other acts and resolutions hereinbefore mentioned, be subject to alteration, amendment, and repeal at the pleasure of Congress. That said Oregon Central Railroad Company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior, within six months from the date hereof, its assent to and acceptance of the provisions of this act, or be forever deprived from taking or receiving any benefit from or under the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF ANIMALS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 59.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 59) to amend certain provisions of the Revised Statutes relating to the transportation of animals was considered as in Committee of the Whole, which had been reported with amendments by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The first amendment of the committee was to fill blanks in the first section, in line 9, by inserting "fourth" before "day" and "July" before "anno Domini."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 22, page 2, to strike out "eight" and insert "four;" and in line 23 to strike out "five" and insert

Shall confine the same in vehicles, railroad-cars, boats, or vessels of any description for a longer period than twenty-four consecutive hours, without unloading the same for rest, water, and feeding for a period of at least seven consecutive hours.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 29, after the word "roads," to insert "or lines of transportation;" and in line 32 to strike out "eight" and insert "four;" so as to read:

In estimating such confinement, the time during which the animals have been confined without such rest on connecting roads or lines of transportation from which they are received shall be included, it being the intent of this section to prohibit their continuous confinement beyond the period of twenty-four hours.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 40, after the word "company," to insert "or persons operating any railroad;" and in line 43 to insert or persons operating the said railroad."

"or persons operating the said railroad."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 50, after the word "company," to insert "or persons operating any railroad;" and in lines 51 and 52 to strike out "who knowingly and willfully fails" and insert "whose duty it may be to perform any of the duties in either of the preceding sections mentioned, who shall knowingly fail," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 55, after the word "sections," to insert "or either of them;" in line 60 to insert after the word "than" the words "one hundred;" in line 61 to fill the blank with "five;" and in line 62 to fill in blank with "one."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 77, after the word "ride," to insert "at his own risk of personal injury."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was after line 100, to insert:

The next amendment of the committee was after line 100, to insert:

And any railroad company, or persons operating any railroad, or the owners or masters of the vehicles or boats or vessels transporting any cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals, which shall have been carried on any line or lines of transportation in the Dominion of Canada, in estimating the twenty four consecutive hours beyond which animals, as provided by this act, shall not be confined without unloading for rest, water, and food, as aforesaid, shall compute the consecutive hours such animals shall have been contined in transportation in Canada, and on knowingly failing to do so shall be subject to the penalties of this act.

And any railroad company, or persons operating any railroad, or the owners or masters of the vehicles, boats, or vessels subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, whose line of transportation forms a part of, or is connected with, any line of transportation in the Dominion of Canada, in making any contract for the transportation of animals aforesaid, whether such transportation be wholly or partly in the United States, shall be subject to the provisions of this act; and if any such company, owner, master, or person shall knowingly bring into, assist, arrange, or provide for bringing into, the United States, for consumption, any of the animals aforesaid, which have been transported in said Dominion, without having been there unloaded for rest, watering, or feeding, as herein directed, shall be liable to the penalties of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. An amendment is necessary on the third line of the first page in consequence of striking out the preamble. I move to strike out the words "preventing the aforesaid evils and;"

That for the purpose of correcting errors in the act entitled, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BOGY. I should like to have the bill read through as amended before it is passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported as amended.

In full?

Mr. BOGY. In full. It is a very important bill. I want to know all about it.

The bill was read at length, as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That for the purpose of correcting errors in the act entitled "An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873," the following amendments are hereby made therein; which amendments shall take effect on the 4th day of July, A. D. 1876:

Section 4386 is amended by striking out the whole section and inserting the fol-

Section 4386. No railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals are conveyed from one State to another, or the owners or masters of steam, sailing, or other vessels carrying or transporting cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals from one State to another, shall confine the same in vehicles, railroad-cars, boats, or vessels of any description for a longer period than twenty-four consecutive hours, without unloading the same for rest, water, and feeding for a period of at least seven consecutive hours, unless prevented from so unloading by storm or other accidental causes; or shall carry or cause or permit to be carried such animals in a cruel or inhuman manner. In estimating such confinement the time during which the animals have been confined without such rest on connecting roads or lines of transportation from which they are received shall be included, it being the intent of this section to prohibit their continuous confinement beyond the period of twenty-four hours, except upon contingencies hereinbefore stated."

hibit their continuous confinement beyond the period of twenty-four hours, except upon contingencies hereinbefore stated."

Section 4387 is amended by striking out the whole section and inserting the following:

"Sec. 4387. Animals so unloaded shall be properly fed and watered during such rest by the owner or person having the custody thereof, or in case of his default in so doing, then by the railroad company, or persons operating any railroad, or owners or masters of the vehicles, or boats, or vessels transporting the same, at the expense of the owner or person in custody thereof; and such company, or persons operating the said railroad, owners, or masters, shall in such case have a lien upon such animals for food, care, and custody furnished, and shall not be liable for any detention of such animals."

Section 4388 is amended by striking out the whole section and inserting the following:

"Sec. 4388. Any company, or persons operating any railroad, owner, or custodian of such animals, whose duty it may be to perform any of the duties in either of the preceding sections mentioned, who shall knowingly fail to comply with the provisions of the two previous sections, or either of them, shall, for every such failure, be liable for and forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars; and any owner, custodian, or person having control over such animals who shall violate any provisions of such sections, shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment. a nine or not less than one number for more than live influence dollars, or by mi-prisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment. But when animals shall be earried in vehicles, railroad-ears, boats, or other vessels in which they can and do have proper food, water, space, and opportunity to rest, the provisions in regard to their being unloaded shall not apply."

Section 4389 is amended by striking out the whole section and inserting the fol-

Section 4389 is amended by striking out the whole section and inserting the following:

"Sec. 4389. Every United States marshal shall, upon the application in writing of any duly incorporated society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, designate an agent of such society, who shall thereupon, within the jurisdiction of such marshal, have power to make arrests and bring before any court or magistrate having jurisdiction offenders found violating any provision of the three preceding sections. Any agent of any such society may ride, at his own risk of personal injury, in or upon any vehicle, railroad car, boat, or vessel of any description in which animals are transported, upon paying the legal rates of fare entitled to be charged upon vehicles, railroad-cars, or vessels intended for the transportation of passengers. And such agent shall also have the right to be present at the loading or unloading upon and off any vehicle, railroad-car, boat, or vessel in which animals are transported, and examine the condition of such animals."

Section 4390 is amended by striking out the whole section and inserting the following;

"Sec. 4390. Any person or corporation entitled to a lien under section 4:87 may enforce the same by a petition filed in the district court holden within the district where the food, care, and custody have been furnished or the owner or custodian of the property resides; and the court shall have power to issue all suitable process for the enforcement of such lien by sale or otherwise, and to compel the payment of all costs, penalties, charges, and expenses of proceedings under the provisions of this and the four preceding sections. The word "State" in such sections shall be held to include the Territories of the United States and the District of Columbia. "And any railroad company, or persons oper ating any railroad, or the owners or masters of the vehicles or boats or vessels transporting any cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals, which shall have been carried on any line or lines of transportation in the Dominion of Canada, in estimating the twenty-four consecutive hours beyond which animals, as provided by this act, shall not be confined without unloading for rest, water, and food, as aforesaid, shall compute the consecutive hours such animals shall have been confined in transportation in Canada, and on knowingly failing to do so shall be subject to the penalties of this act.

Mr. INGALLS. The carrying trade of domestic cattle is very largely conducted through the territory of my own State, and I have long been familiar with the evils that attend it and the fact that some remedy should be applied; but it seems to me that the section reported here by the committee in lieu of section 4389 of the Revised Statutes is open to very serious objection. It creates an officer unknown to the law, bestows upon him very extraordinary powers, leaves him entirely irresponsible, and subjects property always very large in amount to his control and jurisdiction without subjecting him to any bond or obligation whatever to act in good faith and in accordance with law. I trust the chairman of the committee will explain the reasons that induced them to substitute that amendment for the original section, which I think is sufficient.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This bill modifies the act which was passed some two or three years ago, in several particulars. For convenience, to have the law in better shape, this bill is offered as a substitute for the existing law; and I would here say to my friend from Kansas that this bill was submitted to the leading cattle-dealers of the country at a meeting they had in Washington, and it met their approval; that it also has the approval of most of the lines of railway that are engaged in the cattle business. The evil to be remedied is that men who are engaged in that business are obliged practically to conform to the bad practices of others engaged in the business. If there are those who have no principle, and who are entirely regardless of the public health and have no scruples in inflicting cruelty on animals, and who will run their cattle through without giving them water or food or rest for three or four days, those vicious parties practically compel those who desire to do a fair business and to act houestly, to adopt the same rule. There are those who will run their cattle through without giving them any food or rest for three or four days, and then give them plenty of water just before they offer them for sale, which increases their weight some sixty or seventy pounds. The cattle-dealers and the railroad companies are in favor of this bill.

One alteration made in this bill is that it makes twenty-four instead of twenty-eight hours the limit for which cattle may be confined, that being, as I understand, not only a sufficient length of time for the cattle to be confined, but making a proper depot at which they can unload. Another alteration is, that it requires cattle to have rest for seven instead of five hours, five hours not being sufficient to load and unload the many trains of cattle that are transported on these roads.

Another alteration is—and I believe it is that one to which my friend has called attention—in section 4389 of the Revised Statutes, simply authorizing the marshal to appoint a deputy. That officer is as responsible as any other deputy marshal. The marshal appoints a deputy at the suggestion of duly incorporated societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals. I do not know that there is any other party to whom that presentation could more properly be left. It is provided that this agent shall have the right, at his own risk, and paying his fare, to travel on these cattle-cars, the object of which is to secure the evidence that the cattle had been retained without water or food for more than twenty-four hours—a very proper provision, I think.

There is further in this bill the addition of a section which makes the time cattle are carried in Canada to be computed in the twentyfour hours; because, if that provision was not in, it would be giving railroad companies in Canada a preference over our own companies. In order to avoid this law, evil-disposed persons would send their cattle by that route rather than over the routes in this country. I think our railroads are fairly entitled to that protection. We have clearly a right constitutionally to make any provision we please as to the character of the food which shall be introduced into this country for consumption. I do not know that it is necessary to say anything further to explain the provisions of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The purposes of this bill certainly are such as must meet the approbation of all humane men; but the Senator from New Jersey still fails to note the objection to which I desired to call his attention. The original section in the Revised Statutes declares:

The penalty created by the preceding sections shall be recovered by civil action in the name of the United States, in the circuit or district court of the United States holden within the district where the violation may have been committed or the person or corporation resides or carries on its business; and it shall be the duty of all United States marshals, their deputies and subordinates, to prosecute all violations which come to their notice or knowledge.

It appears to me that the authority there conferred and the protection there sought to be enforced are ample. The objection that I urge against the section that is substituted by the committee is that creates an officer unknown to the law, without responsibility, and delegates to him very extraordinary powers. In fact it places the whole property that may be in a train of cars for transportation solely at the mercy of an agent of a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals designated by a marshal and residing, as it may be, in New York when in fact the property is in transit through Kansas, or Nebraska, or Texas, and upon whom the owners of the property have no guarantee whatever for the proper discharge of his duties.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will my friend show me what part of the act does place the cattle at the disposal of that agent?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly. The provision is:

Every United States marshal shall, upon the application in writing of any duly incorporated society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, designate an agent of such society—

Not as a deputy marshal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Go on.

Mr. INGALLS. Not as a deputy marshal, having no responsibility whatever under the bond of the marshal—who shall thereupon within the jurisdiction of such marshal have power to make arrests and bring before any court or magistrate having jurisdiction offenders found violating any provision of the three preceding sections.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is nothing in that section except that a deputy marshal shall be appointed by the marshal at the suggestion of these societies. When he is appointed a deputy he gives bond I presume of course, and is amenable to the law as any other deputy marshal is. Mr. INGALLS.

Then let that proviso be inserted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. This certainly does not constitute an agent of a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals a deputy of the marshal, as it now stands; but it makes him an independent officer of the law and confers upon him extraordinary powers. I would suggest that the section be so amended as to provide that this agent shall give bond like any other deputy marshal of the United States

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will accept any amendment of that kind, but I do not think it is necessary. I think it is really there already.

Mr. WHYTE. I would inquire whether a deputy marshal does give bond. The marshal gives bond, but I do not think a deputy marshal ever gives a bond.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I believe my friend is right, so that the amendment is not necessary. All that it is necessary to say is that he shall be a deputy marshal.

Mr. BOGY. But the marshal is responsible on his bond for the action of his deputy.

Mr. WHYTE. I was going to make that very remark. The language of this section should certainly be changed so as not to put this power in the hands of an agent, but the appointment should be of a deputy marshal, subject to removal just as deputy marshals are now subject to removal by the district or the circuit court. They are under the control of the court. This agent would be not under the control of the courts at all; and he might be a very bad man; he might be a very bad character, and yet the court would not have the power to remove him unless he be made a deputy marshal and subject to the penalties and subject to the powers reserved by the statutes to the courts of the United States over deputy marshals.

Mr. INGALLS. It appears to me that he ought also to be a citi-

Mr. INGALLS. It appears to me that he ought also to be a citizen of the jurisdiction.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Maryland is precisely right. On looking at line 70, page 4, of this bill, you will observe that it is made compulsory on the United States marshal—on "the application in writing of any" and of course of every, "duly-incorporated society for the prevention of cruelty to animals," to "designate an agent of such society." That is delegating the discretion of the appointment to the society. We have here, then, a law, or a bill intended to become a law, which will give to these societies the discretionary appointment of their own agents to exercise power under a law of the United States. There is no question but that the bill is open to that objection:

Every United States marshal shall upon the amplication in writing of any duly.

Every United States marshal shall, upon the application in writing of any duly-incorporated society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, designate an agent of such society, who shall thereupon, within the jurisdiction of such marshal, have power to make arrests and bring before any court or magistrate having jurisdiction offenders found violating any provision of the three preceding sections.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senator who designates the

Mr. BAYARD. The society for the prevention of cruelty to animals.
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not at all. The marshal does.
Mr. BAYARD. It is done on their application. "Qui facit per alium, facit per se." The society has the power to demand the appointment of whom? Of some one in writing whom they shall suggest to the marshal, and who shall thereupon designate that person to be—what? To be the agent for the society to enforce this act. The language of the act is precise and unmistakable.

Not only that Mr. President: not only by the force of this act do.

Not only that, Mr. President; not only by the force of this act do you transfer the power of appointing deputy marshals to these privately-incorporated institutions—which is certainly a matter entirely beyond the power of Congress, because the power of appointment is one of high discretion, and discretion cannot be delegated—but, in addition to that, it not merely proposes this system of compulsory appointment of the agents of these societies, but it authorizes them to do what the United States marshal cannot do; that is, it purports to confer power to make arrests, no word being said of previous warrant or of application for due process of law to precede this. This is meant to be a summary arrest, without writ, not by a marshal, but by an agent thus appointed. We cannot authorize that. It is an invasion of personal liberty that the Congress of the United States is not competent to authorize. There is no "due process of law" in it; but this authorizes not only the marshal to do this, but his deputies to do it; and he shall appoint these deputies, not at his own discretion, but upon the application in writing of these societies.

It strikes me that even admitting (which I do not) that this is a wholesome assumption of power by the United States, an extension of their functions over those matters which properly belong to the police power of the States themselves, yet to give to the agents of these societies powers without responsibility, and powers of executing arrests without those safeguards which the liberty of the citizen demands, is open to the objection made by the Senator from Maryrant or of application for due process of law to precede this.

demands, is open to the objection made by the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Kansas to the section.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This act says that every United States marshal shall do what? "Designate an agent;" not that the societies shall designate the agent at all.

Every United States marshal shall, upon the application in writing of any duly-incorporated society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, designate an agent of such society.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator a question? Can he designate any one not an agent of the society?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He designates any one who is a member f that society as an agent.

Mr. BAYARD. Then the society tell him whom to designate.
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The only limitation on the power of the marshal is that the person shall be a member of that society. Now, as to the power to make arrests, it is rather news to me that a deputy marshal cannot make arrests even without process for a violation of law before his eyes. He can do it; and this is only to be done under these circumstances.

As to the point that this is an invasion of the police powers of the States, if Congress has any power it is the power to regulate commerce between the States, and this only applies to the transportation of cattle between the States—to interstate commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether in his opinion, under the provisions of this section, it would not be pos sible to appoint citizens of New York or Massachusetts, who should proceed to Nebraska or Texas or Kansas and there exercise these extraordinary functions under the marshals of those States; and whether or not in that case, if these agents violate their duty or inflict a wrong upon the citizen, the marshal himself would be responsible for their acts?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is in this law no limitation as to who this deputy marshal shall be, any more than there is a law as to who shall be marshal for the district of the United States which is composed of the State of Kansas. It is left just as the law is left in reference to all marshals and all deputy marshals. The only limitation is that the person appointed must be a member of the society making the application.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that as I think this bill will run some time, I trust he will have no objection to this this on will rule some time, I take he will have he objection to having it passed over, so that we may proceed to the consideration of the resolution in regard to Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course the Senator from Indiana has a right to call for the regular business at any time. As I believe there is but one opinion in reference to this bill, if there are any Senators who prefer looking at it further so as to suggest amendments, I have no objection to its going over. If we can have a vote now I should

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator would consent to strike out the section proposed as a substitute for section 4389 and allow the section to stand as it is in the Revised Statutes, I should have no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will not my friend from Indiana postpone his motion for half an hour, and perhaps in that time the bill can be disposed of?

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator from New Jersey is satisfied to allow this bill to go by at two o'clock, if not then disposed of, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I supposed my friend from Indiana had a right to call up the Pinchback resolution at any time, and I would not wish to interpose this bill in opposition to him; but as this bill is regularly before the Senate, I think we can dispose of it in a very

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to continuing the consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. In response to what has fallen from the Senator from New Jersey, I desire to call his attention to the fact that in the original section, as it now stands, it is made the duty of the United States marshals, their deputies and subordinates, to prosecute all violations which come to their notice or knowledge; and I must object to the provisions of this substituted section which authorize the appointment of these extraordinary agents with unusual powers and without any guarantee for their proper exercise; and I shall propose, if a motion is necessary, that the Senate do not agree to the amend-ment reported by the committee, the effect of that being to allow the ment reported by the committee, the effect of that being to allow the law to stand as it is in the original statute upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to say one word in reply to my friend from Kansas on the section about which he has been speaking. It appears to me, and I think it appeared to the committee, that there could be no denoted to viviate rights in the exercise of this power. could be no danger to private rights in the exercise of this power. The offense which is to be committed is an offense which is to be ascertained, like a row in the public streets by a policeman, on inspection. Anybody having any reasonable intelligence can see on going into a car or into a railroad-yard where there is a train of cattle, whether they are in distress and are famishing or not. It is a thing that is as open to observation, I submit, as any act of wrong that can happen. It is a plain case. Mr. INGALLS.

He cannot tell whether they have ridden twenty-four or twenty-five hours, on inspection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly true; you cannot tell whether they have ridden twenty-four or twenty-five hours, but you can tell that an animal has ridden so long (which is supposed to be beyond twenty-four hours) that it is in a condition that nobody, with any sense of feeling or kindness to brute animals, would fail to feel greatly disturbed at seeing. Now, then, this responsible person, a deputy marshal, who is supposed to be intelligent, who must act in good faith or otherwise he is personally liable—

Mr. INGALLS. Does this constitute him a deputy marshal?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know whether it does or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know whether it does or not.
Mr. INGALLS. I think it does not.
Mr. EDMUNDS. It says that every United States marshal shall lesignate a certain agent, which I take to mean a deputy.

Mr. INGALLS. It certainly does not say so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know it does not say so, but it is a person who is acting under his authority; and if he finds that a person or a company has been guilty of violating this act, from the knowledge that he had before in riding on this train, or from the appearance of the animals that it is a case for interference, he then brings the proper parties immediately before a United States commissioner.

Mr. INGALLS. But the bill expressly says he is the agent of the

Mr. INGALLS. But the bill expressly says he is the agent of the society and not of the marshal; so he cannot be a deputy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know he is an agent of the society; but that is the description of the person, I submit to my friend. It is only that in order to exercise this authority, which probably nobody but some one acting under the authority of the United States can exercise, he is to take as his deputy or person acting for him in executing this law, his agent, out of a particular class of persons; that is, out of that class of persons who make it their humane business to protect animals against cruelty; and it certainly is a humane business; not only humane in respect to that kindness with which we ought to treat other beings not human, but humane in the sense of protecting society against diseased food, which is a branch of the subject that ought not to be lost sight of. Now, this responsible person thus carefully elected on view of the circumstances is authorized to make an arrest. He takes the party before a United States commissioner. Suppose it should turn out in some instance, as undoubtedly it would turn out, as it does in all classes of arrests, that the arrest was wrong and that the law and humanity had both been complied with, what of it? That is a fault that exists everywhere in jurisprudence, I submit to my friend. Sometimes it will happen that innocent people are wrongfully subjected to criminal prosecution. But in the great majority of instances under this act the parties interested will be powerful railroad corporations; and they are powerful; they have great influence, that extends everywhere. Here are powerful railroad corporations to operate against. The arrest of the conductor of a train if you please or of the master of transportation, or of anybody, brings down upon this luckless agent the whole weight of the corporate authority. think, then, it will not happen very often that the persons who are to make these arrests will make a mistake on the wrong side. The mistakes they will make will be in being overcareful not to interfere mistakes they will make will be in being overcareful not to interfere with these great powers that are running these railroads—these lines of transportation. While in a strict personal sense, if it were applied to private and personal affairs, it might be said this was a stretch of discretion, when you apply it to the particular body of people to whom it alone does apply, I submit to my friend there can be no danger at all. ger at all.
Mr. INGALLS. Certainly railroad corporations are entitled to precisely the same protection as private individuals.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So they are.

Mr. INGALLS. And it is just as much our duty as Senators upon this floor to see that they are properly guarded, and that the possibility of wrongs against them is justly restrained; and upon the admission of the Senator himself this bill is so indefinite in its terms that sion of the senator masser has an is so intermited in the terms that it is not possible for him to say whether the words "agent of such society" are a description of the person merely, or whether they refer to his office. Further than that, in line 77 there seems to be a perfect divorce between the powers of this agent of the society and his assumed capacity as deputy marshal, because it is expressly declared that "any agent of any such society," apparently ignoring entirely his power under and by virtue of his appointment, "shall have the authority to ride in and upon any vehicle, railroad-car, boat," &c., for the express purpose of exercising these very powers that are conferred upon him. So that it seems to me that the point I make is entirely proper, and that there is an attempt to confer upon somebody, not a citizen it may be of the State or the country, irresponsible authority, that places at his control and his mercy the interests of corporations it may be, but at the same time interests that are entitled to our protection; and this agent, if he is the agent of the marshal, certainly ought to be declared to be subject to the same punishment and to the same restriction that a deputy marshal is, and there ought to be some bond given, or at least some way provided by which a person who has been wronged shall have the means of immediate redress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I entirely agree with the Senator from Kansas that a railroad corporation is just as much entitled to our protection, as Senators in law-making, as the humblest person in the United States; but this is not a question of power and protection in that sense. It is a mere question of the abuse of delegated powers. Now, when you come to the question of the abuse of delegated powers, there when you come to the question of the abuse of delegated powers, there is a wide difference whether such abuse is likely to happen against somebody who is powerful or whether it may happen against somebody who is weak. That is the difference; and in that respect I submit to my honorable friend that there is a great difference in respect of the expediency of this law whether you apply it to some private citizen in a school district or whether you apply it to somebody who is always ready and able to take care of himself. So far as the right goes and protection of the right, of course the law ought to be equal for the high and for the low; but when you are merely making an objection to a law on the ground that it may be abused, then you have a right to look to the question whether it is likely that the persons who may be abused by the exercise of this power are people who would fall under the category of those who were not able to take care of themselves. I think that is the point.

of themselves. I think that is the point.

Now, my friend says that these persons ought to be responsible.

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. Will the constituting of this agent of the society a deputy marshal give him the same jurisdiction and powers in other matters outside of the duties embraced in this bill that pertain to other deputy marshals?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends upon how you constitute him. A deputy marshal is a thing unknown to the law, except in the sense that the marshal is authorized to execute process and to make arrests, and he may employ other persons to do this work for him. The statutes of the United States do not recognize any such office as that of a deputy marshal, any more than the common law recognizes

Mr. WEST. The law authorizes the marshal to appoint deputy marshals and makes him responsible for their acts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, it makes him responsible for their acts, which is a mere affirmance of the common law. Any marshal or sheriff who appoints a deputy is responsible for his acts, whether the law says so or not. It results from the very nature of the relation between the principal and his deputy. Everybody is responsible for the acts of his deputy or agent; it is a mere question of phrase. Whatever an agent does in the line of authority binds his principal, and the principal is responsible for it.

Mr. WEST. This, then, binds the marshal to select a man that the society shall designate and makes the marshal responsible for the acts of that man.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not bind the marshal to designate the agent. Mr. WEST. Then I cannot understand the language.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Out of a particular class of persons the marshal is to designate a person in whom he has confidence and who will is to designate a person in whom he has confidence and who will truly execute the law. That is all there is to it.

Then when my friend from Kansas comes to the next paragraph in the section, which he says refers to any agent of this society, as it does, and gives any agent general authority, he is mistaken. It does not give any agent general authority. Any agent of these humane societies is entitled to ride, on the payment of his fare, on the freight trains, but it is only one agent of the society who is to be selected by the marshal, who has the power to make arrests; and if this thing were carried into force the humane societies would have various agents riding mon these trains all the time to see first and on the agents riding upon these trains all the time to see, first, and on the spot, that these poor animals, that have nobody to take care of them but Congress, (for the States cannot do it, because they are passing from State to State all the time,) are duly treated, and, in the second place, that everybody who eats beef or pork or whatever is also protected; but the power of the law so far as it respects making arrests is confined to one person, who is to be selected by the marshal, and who is in effect his deputy, exercising the power of the law to arrest persons who have been guilty of cruelty. That is all. I am sure there is no danger in it.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend the amendment of the committee in his 20 persons the provided in the committee.

in line 72, page 4, by striking out the word "designate" and inserting the word "deputize," and after the word "society" in line 73 inserting "for whose official acts the marshal so deputizing shall be responsible;" so that, if amended, the clause will read:

Every United States marshal shall, upon the application in writing of any duly-incorporated society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, deputize an agent of such society, for whose official acts the marshal so deputizing shall be responsible, who shall thereupon, within the jurisdiction of such marshal, have power, &c.

Mr. WHYTE. It occurs to me that there is ample power now in the deputy marshals of the several States through which cattle are transported; but I would suggest, if it is in order, in lieu of the proposition of the Senator from Kansas, to strike out, in lines 72 and 73, the words "designate an agent of such society" and insert "appoint a deputy marshal." Under the law of the United States the powers of a deputy marshal are regulated just as the marshal's powers are regulated. He takes an oath before the court to discharge his duty with fidelity. This person, who seems to be under no responsibilities what-ever, who gives no bond, is to be invested with power to arrest par-ties on their way from the West to the seaboard, apparently without warrant, and either to detain the train or allow the train to pass on warrant, and either to detain the train or allow the train to pass on with the cattle on board with no care of the cattle-dealer over his stock. If it is in order at this time, I would suggest, therefore, that the words "designate an agent of such society" be stricken out and the words "appoint a deputy marshal" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland confers no new power. The marshal now has authority to appoint a deputy whose duty it shall be to bring to punishment any violator of this law. The Senator will find that, in the original section, No. 4389, the authority there conferred is ample for the very nurpose he suggests: purpose he suggests:

It shall be the duty of all United States marshals, their deputies and subordinates, to prosecute all violations which come to their notice or knowledge,

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me a mo-

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me a moment? I suggest to him that it would be rather singular legislation to authorize a marshal to deputize an agent.

Mr. INGALLS. That is what I think.

Mr. CONKLING. I entirely concur with the Senator in his idea and suggest to him that if, after the word "who," if I remember the phraseology of the section, he would amend by inserting the words "being specially deputized," it would answer his purpose and would make the person not only a deputy but a special deputy, and that would involve, among other advantages, the safeguard of his always being required to show his precent as a special deputy always must. being required to show his precept, as a special deputy always must, I believe, whereas a general deputy need not. A regular peace officer, beside the power to arrest on view for a violation of law and the power to arrest on rumor, in many cases, on reputation, can arrest power to arrest on rumor, in many cases, on reputation, can arrest with the precept in his pocket and nobody can demand of him, as I understand the law, that he shall show his precept; whereas, if he is a special deputy, he is subject to a more rigid obligation both in the act of making an arrest or exerting his power and in the act of justifying when he comes to be called to account afterward. Now I suggest to the Senator that if he were to say "being specially deputized" he would answer his own purpose and also that of one or two other Senators who have suggested that this is conferring a somewhat large discretion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Ingalls] and also that of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] pertain to the text of the bill, the Chair will put the question on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas; and the Senator from Maryland has offered an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. The object I had in view was to secure the designa-tion of an officer who would be under the control of the courts of the United States. I think that heretofore, in addition to the power of the marshal to remove his own deputy, Congress has thought proper to put into the hands of the district court and the circuit court a revisory power over the marshal's appointee. Now, unless this officer is a regular deputy marshal, recognized under the statutes of the United States, he will not be removable by the courts. I think that this is a very healthy provision, and therefore I offer it as a substitute for the proposition of the Senator from Kansas. In lieu of the proposition of the Senator from Kansas. In lieu of the proposition of the Senator from Kansas, I propose to strike out the words "designate an agent of such society" and insert "appoint a deputy marshal." Then the marshal is responsible on his bond for his acts without inserting the language used by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. That is the common law without any statutory

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There are two objections to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. I wish my friend would adopt the suggestion of the Senator from New York. It seems to me it would cover the whole case. The objection to his amendment is that it entirely divorces the societies who have this matter in charge from entirely divorces the societies who have this matter in charge from having any opportunity for a supervision of the subject.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me to make a single suggestion? As I understand the law, a deputy marshal can only be specially appointed to perform a specific service.

Mr. CONKLING. A single act of service.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir; and I understand that the object of this law is to create an officer whose duties shall be general within any given jurisdiction, to have particular charge of this special branch of business.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand the Senator from Kauser to

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand the Senator from Kansas to mean that if a person becomes a deputy marshal for a special service, as, for example, this service, or the service involved in the statute denouncing obscene literature in the mails, he must necessarily thereby nouncing obscene literature in the mails, he must necessarily thereby become a general deputy, chargeable with and responsible for all the functions and ministrations of a general deputy marshal?

Mr. INGALLS. My understanding has always been very distinct that a deputy specially appointed could only act within the particular jurisdiction which he was to exercise.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that this case?

Mr. INGALLS. I should very much doubt whether a deputy could be appointed specially to attend to any particular branch of business with a sort of roving commission to prosecute it wherever he pleased.

be appointed specially to attend to any particular branch of business with a sort of roving commission to prosecute it wherever he pleased. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would simply say that if that fails I will then offer an amendment to insert after the word "society" the words "to be a deputy marshal."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The CHEEF CLEEK. The amendment of Mr. INGALLS is to strike out ment of the Senator from Kansas.

The CHMEF CLERK. The amendment of Mr. INGALLS is to strike out the word "designate," in line 72, and insert "specially deputize;" and after the word "society," in line 73, to insert "for whose official acts the marshal so deputizing shall be responsible."

Mr. INGALLS. What does the Senator from New Jersey propose to substitute for that?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I propose after that is voted upon, unless it be withdrawn, to insert after the word "society," in the seventy-third line, "to be a deputy marshal;" avoiding the question which seems to have arisen as to the powers of the special marshal, although that did not present any difficulty to my mind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey will bear in mind that an amendment to this clause was proposed by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Whyte,] which will come next.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That I think ought to be voted down, as well as the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas insist upon his amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; I withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas is withdrawn and the question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Whyte,] which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk. In line 72 it is proposed to strike out the words "designate an agent of such society" and insert "appoint a deputy marshal." so as to read:

marshal;" so as to read:

Every United States marshal shall, upon the application in writing of any duly in-corporated society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, appoint a deputy mar-shal, who shall thereupon, within the jurisdiction of such marshal, have power to make arrests, &c.

Mr. WHYTE. Of course it is in contemplation that the society shall pay the expenses of this deputy marshal braveling upon the road, and that each marshal in the district through which the railway passes will appoint the same man deputy marshal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that that provision, in the first place, is not necessary, for the marshal has the power now to appoint deputy marshals, but the serious objection to it is that it divorces these societies from having any charge over this subject. amendment which I shall propose, if this is voted down, as I hope it may be, will make the section read in this way:

Every United States marshal shall, upon the application in writing of any duly incorporated society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, designate an agent of such society to be a deputy marshal, who shall thereupon, within the jurisdiction,

Mr. CLAYTON. The objection which the amendment of the Senator from Maryland brings to my mind is this: You require the marshal to appoint this deputy upon the recommendation of the society; he has no control of the matter himself. He must appoint upon their recommendation, and the moment he makes such an appointment he becomes responsible in his official character for the act of that deputy;

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He is to make an appointment, but they are not to say whom he shall appoint.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am speaking now of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WHYTE. My amendment is that whoever he shall appoint shall be a deputy marshal. I have moved to strike out the words "designate an agent of such society."

Mr. CLAYTON. I did not so understand the reading of it. I ask the Clerk to read the section again as it would stand if amended by the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again re-

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Every United States marshal shall, upon the application in writing of any duly incorporated society for the prevention of cruelty to animals appoint a deputy marshal, who shall thereupon, within the jurisdiction of such marshal, have power to make arrests, &c.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is right.

Mr. McDONALD. The objection the Senator from New Jersey makes to this amendment is the very reason why I think it ought to be adopted. He says it divorces these societies from the execution of this law. That is precisely what I desire to see done. It seems to me that if they have the power to bring to the attention of proper officers violations of this law and to see that those officers discharge their duties with reference to them, that is all that ought to be conceded to them. I am not in favor of intrusting the administration of the laws of the country to voluntary associations of this kind, or in any manner to give them any peculiar privilege or prerogative in reference to the enforcement of the law. This bill as it stands now, without the amendment, vests in these associations the sole power of providing an officer of the Government to execute this law, for although the marshal has to appoint a deputy he is limited in the selection of that deputy to a member of one of these associations. It seems to me to be a very vicious principle, and therefore I desire most earnestly that the amendment of the Senator from Maryland shall prevail.

Mr. WEST. Suppose they do not recommend anybody, what then? Mr. McDONALD. If the amendment prevails the marshal can appoint any one he may deem a fit and proper person for the purpose; but if the amendment does not prevail, as I understand the original act, then he can only make his selection from the associations and can take no one outside of them.

Mr. INGALLS. And put the whole eattle business of the country at the mercy of Henry Bergh.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that no objection should be made to these societies having so much to do with this subject as that the appointment shall be made from a member of a society, its agent, who is to be kept there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Whyte.]

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 27,

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee also reported an amendment to strike out the preamble. The question is on the amendment of the committee striking out the preamble.

The preamble was read, as follows:

Whereas animals which are transported in the United States in railroad-cars, vehicles, boats, and other vessels from one State to another are frequently deprived of their sustenance for long periods of time, and are overcrowded, and otherwise inhumanly and cruelly ill-treated, and their flesh in many cases thereby rendered diseased and unfit and dangerous for human food; and whereas the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States intended hereby to be amended are insufficient to prevent such evils.

The amendment was agreed to.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Shall the bill

Mr. BAYARD. It may seem ungracious perhaps to make any opposition to a measure so well intended as the present, its object being to relieve suffering, whether animal or human; nor do I deny, I am not prepared to deny, that there is authority in Congress under the enumeration of powers delegated in the Constitution, included in which is that to regulate commerce between the States, to infuse the spirit of humanity into the operations of Congress. It has been done too often, and it speaks too strongly in its own behalf to be opposed. At often, and it speaks too strongly in its own behalf to be opposed. At the same time, there is a legislation into which too much of sentimentality may be infused for safety and for wisdom. While I am not prepared to deny that there is power in the Government of the United States to frame its law in the regulation of commerce between the States so as to prevent any acts of inhumanity in anything having a bearing on commerce, at the same time I believe the present law in its very laudable desire to check cruelty, one of the worst of human vices has gone too much into detail and left too little to of human vices, has gone too much into detail and left too little to those other regulating forces that exist under our system of government. Almost all the States have power, either statutory or by common law, to punish the vice of human cruelty, whether exerted toward human beings or toward the animal creation; and almost all the States have by legislation and through their machinery of justice prevented and punished much that otherwise would have occurred in the way of cruelty. But here in section 4389 of the Revised Statutes as amended by this bill, it seems to me that Congress is exercising a power unwisely and inexpediently. There is too much of detailed intermeddling with the active business of our population which can be much better left to the plenary powers of the States to control by their own police organization.

See what the result of this section will be. The great body of the transportation of merchandise and passengers in the United States is carried on now by means of railways and other vehicles, referred to in this bill. You have by this section created a whole broad of United States police officers who are, without regard to locality, all over the States police officers who are, without regard to locality, all over the Union to enter upon these numberless conveyances and exercise an espionage upon the conduct of traffic, which may be exceedingly mischievous, exceedingly irritating, exceedingly annoying, for the sake of accomplishing a good which the law of every State to-day permits to be accomplished through other agencies. Every man who desires the defense of our system will be very glad to avoid the possibility of a clashing of jurisdiction. There are many cases in which the United States are confessed to have jurisdiction in which I think it would be unwise to claim or exercise it, simply because the functions it proposes can be better executed by the authority of the States.

This section, even as amended, gives in effect the power to a society incorporated for this benevolent purpose of preventing cruelty, to apply to the marshal, no matter where the society may exist; its power of application to the marshal is untrammeled; it extends to every district of the United States wherein there is a marshal, and he must, upon application of any society of any State or any number of soscieties in all the States, appoint just as many deputy marshals as they shall respectively call on him to appoint for the purpose of making this law efficient. Every railroad company and every common carrier must, without regard to their convenience, without regard to their safety, permit any one of this unlimited number of officials to take his place upon cars not designated or intended for the safe transportation of human beings

Then, coupled with that, is the power of summary arrest. We have been told that an officer has power to arrest when an act is performed is his view of an unlawful character. Grant that that is an exception; but this is not the performance of an act of an unlawful character in his view. It is the possession and custody of these dumb animals which have been deprived of food and water at a place for a space of time over which the individual who may then have them in charge may have no knowledge or control.

I can see in this a new pretext for new appointments, the creation of new offices, of new expenses, of new interferences, of more government of the people of the United States by the Federal Congress. Now, sir, I may say that after all the great remedy for the wrongs which are attempted to be fought by this bill is perhaps the not very high one of human self-interest. If the cruelties hinted at by this bill were to be performed, they must be at the cost of the owner of these cattle. He must suffer in his pocket; the purchaser must suffer, the consumer must suffer. Therefore, it seems to me, when you have these natural safeguards to protect it, legislation is not wise, because it is not necessary.

For these reasons, very unpremeditatedly, very partially, and very feebly expressed, I shall vote against this bill. I voted, two years ago I think, against the enactment of the law to which this is proposed as an amendment. I am unable, after hearing the debate and after close examination of the section, to get rid of the idea that this act does delegate to these benevolent societies a virtual power of appointment of United States officials, which the Congress of the United States in my opinion has no power to grant to them. No man has a right to be an officer of the United States except under law; and we cannot delegate to others the power to greate officers, nor can we remand delegate to others the power to greate officers, nor can we remand delegate to others the power to greate officers, nor can we remand delegate to others the power to greate officers, nor can we remand the second of the content of the cannot delegate to others the power to create officers, nor can we restrain the marshals of the United States in executing the laws of the United States to a designated class of persons, and those to be the agents of incorporated societies, no matter how benevolent or excelagents of incorporated societies, no matter how benevolent or excellent may be the object of that corporation. It is clearly beyond the power of Congress so to delegate its discretion. It would be unwise, if it were not beyond its power. There are many functions of this Government the existence of which I readily admit but the exercise of which I very distinctly question. This is one. I think it unwise to meddle with this question, or control it in the way in which it has been sought to be controlled by the original law, of which this is an amendment, as well as by the present bill. It is only going further in the wrong direction in my view, and for that reason I shall ask for the yeas and navs on the passage of this bill, in order to place myself upon yeas and nays on the passage of this bill, in order to place myself upon the record against it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I should be very glad to vote for some proper measure having in view the main purpose contemplated by this bill; but it is utterly impossible for me to vote for this bill if it and the latest statement of the Period State.

by this bill; but it is utterly impossible for me to vote for this bill if it contains the clause amending section 4389 of the Revised Statutes. It seems to me that that clause violates expressly personal rights and the plain provisions of the Constitution of the United States. It authorizes an official, without warrant or without affidavit, to arrest a party upon his own suggestion and carry him before a magistrate. It seems to me, with all respect, that that proposition is monstrous, and I am astonished to find it in a bill of so serious a character as this. The Constitution provides that—

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to seized.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

There are cases where a peace officer, seeing the criminal law of the country violated, may interfere to prevent the commission of crime; but that is not the case contemplated here. Here the marshal must go himself, or he must send a regular deputy, upon an expedition of espionage, and whenever he finds what he conceives to be a violation of this statute, setting himself up as a judge, when he finds one violating it according to his judgment, he is to seize him, without warrant, without the oath of anybody, and take him before a commissioner or a judge of the United States, and have him committed or discharged as the judge may determine that the marshal was right or wrong.

It seems to me, I again say with all respect, that such a proposi-tion is monstrous. It shocks my notions of legal propriety and set-tled principles of liberty. I repeat what I said at the ouset, that I am ready, and willing, and anxious, because I believe there is such a grievance as that contemplated by this bill, to vote for a reasonable proposition; but I cannot consent to see a citizen of the United States under such circumstances arrested without a warrant or the affidavit of anybody.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted-yeas 30, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Ilarvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, McMilan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Randolph, Robertson, Sherman, West, and Windom—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, English, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—24.

So the bill was passed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. McCREERY it was Ordered. That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of A. L. Shotwell, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 12th instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 62) to authorize George P. Marsh to accept a certain present from the government of Switzerland and a certain present from the government of Italy.

PENSIONERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. WITHERS. I desire to give notice that I will call up to-morrow Senate bill No. 89.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is it about?

Mr. WITHERS. It is to restore to the pension-roll the names of persons stricken from it on account of disloyalty.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and re-

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 65) authorizing Edwin James, consular agent at San José, to accept a piece of plate from the Queen of Great Britain, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. HARVEY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to present to the Senate such suggestions as may be deemed expedient for the public service, covering the period between May 19, 1869, and October 1, 1872, to enable the Government to carry out the provisions of an act constituting eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, approved June 25, 1868.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Secretary of War is not the proper person, it seems to me. I have no objection to the resolution myself, but a great deal of delusion has grown up and a great waste of public money been incurred by applying to Government employés a rule not applied to those of private individuals. At the same time I think the Secretary of the Treasury ought rather to be called upon think the secretary of the Treasury ought rather to be called upon for the information, as it affects our public buildings, I suppose.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. President, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio I will state that I think the information sought for can only be obtained from the War Department, inasmuch as the difficulty for which we seek a remedy grew out of the fact that in some of the military departments the commanders, or those upon whom the practical administration of the law referred to devolved, seem to have ignored the law or misconstrued it until attention was called to it by Executive proclamations, and the men affected by it were thereafter paid the wages they were entitled to for the time contemplated by the law. The Secretary of War, no doubt, has knowledge of the facts, and can suggest a remedy for the complications resulting from the facts alluded to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the resolution had better go over. It involves a question that we have had up two or three times

Mr. HARVEY. If it gives rise to any discussion, I am willing that it shall go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to its present consideration, the resolution lies over.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution in regard to Mr. Pinchback.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the considera-tion of the following resolution submitted by Mr. Morton on the 5th of March, 1875:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years beginning the 4th day of March, 1873;

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. Edmunds to insert the word "not" before the word "admitted."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. MORTON. If no other Senator desires to speak, I will say something in respect to what has been said, before the vote is taken. I do not care about anticipating any Senator who desires to speak

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question? Mr. MORTON. I take it for granted that no other Senators desire to debate this question, and as the Senator who introduced the res-olution, and as the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elecolution, and as the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I propose to say something in answer to the argument advanced by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Thurman.]

Mr. Morton proceeded to address the Senate, but without concluding yielded to Mr. EDMUNDS.

[Mr. Morton's speech is reserved from publication at his request until after it shall have been concluded. It appears in full in the Appendix 1. Appendix.]

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, After thirty-six minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and fifty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the House a bill (S. No. 14) to extend the time for the construction and completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made the bill will remain upon the Speaker's table.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. McCRARY. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. No. 1798) to re-organize the judiciary, which has been made the special order for Wednesday next, is out of print, and I therefore move by unanimous consent that the bill be reprinted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SURVEY OF THE ISTHMUS.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That there be printed three hundred copies of Lieutenant F. Collins's report on the late survey of the Isthmus of Darien for an interoceanic canal.

Mr. CONGER. Let me inquire of the gentleman from New York why he does not include in his resolution the printing of all the reports of that survey which have not yet been printed?

why he does not hended in his resolution the printing of all the reports of that survey which have not yet been printed?

Mr. COX. I have no objection to have the Committee on Printing consider the resolution in that way. I think perhaps it would be wise.

Mr. CONGER. Then let the gentleman modify his resolution in that way.

Mr. COX. I will accept the modification. Then the whole matter will be in the discretion of the Committee on Printing. It commits nobody. I ask the gentleman to draw up his modification and I will accept it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that he state the substance of his modification so that the business of the House may proceed.

Mr. CONGER. I move to include in the reference to the Committee on Printing the expediency of printing all of the reports of surveys of the Isthmus which now remain unprinted. I understand there are two or three on the same general subject which have not been printed. The SPEAKER. The resolution of the gentleman from New York will be modified so as to include in the reference to the Committee on Printing the propriety of printing such reports of surveys of the Isthmus of Darien as have not yet been printed.

The resolution as modified was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at a quarter before one o'clock. This being Monday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the calling of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for printing and reference.

Is there objection that this call of the States shall be completed as in the morning hour without reference to the actual termination of that hour?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER called Mr. BLACKBURN to the Chair as Speaker pro

MAYOR'S OFFICE, Saint Louis, February 8, 1876.

Saint Louis, February 8, 1876.

GENTLEMEN: On behalf of the city of Saint Louis, and in accordance with the request of the city council of said city, I have the honor to memorialize your honorable bodies for such action as may be necessary to permanently establish the legal front or wharf-line of the city of Saint Louis as the same is defined and recommended in the last annual report of General J. H. Simpson, Corps of Engineers, being appendix L of the annual report of the Chief of Engineers for 1875.

In carrying out municipal improvements along the river front with a view to facilitating commerce and protecting our harbor, questions have arisen in connection with the territory of the State of Illinois opposite this city, which render it desirable that the lines on both sides should, if practicable, be established and confirmed by Congress.

ble that the lines on both sides should, if practicable, be established and confirmed by Congress.

For the purpose of consummating a permanent and satisfactory settlement of all questions involved, a consultation took place between the governor and other officials of the State of Illinois and the authorities of this city which has resulted in a mutual concurrence in the lines defining both sides of the Mississippi in front of this city at low water, as proposed and explained in the report of General Simpson above referred to, and the plat accompanying same, at Washington.

Wherefore your memorialist respectfully prays the early consideration of this subject by Congress, and for such legislation thereon as may be necessary to accomplish the object above stated.

Accompanying this memorial will be found a copy of the resolutions adouted by Accompanying this memorial will be found a copy of the resolutions adopted by the city council of the city of Saint Louis in connection with the subject, and also a certified copy of the ordinance establishing the wharf-line in the southern part of the city upon the lines proposed by General Simpson.

RAILROAD LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. GOODIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present some resolutions passed by the Legislature of Kansas upon the subject of certain public lands granted to the State in aid of the construction of a railroad. I suppose under this call, if introduced, they would go properly to the Committee on the Public Lands. It is not, however, for the purpose of influencing the committee that these resolutions are now presented, but rather with a view to get them published in the RECORD, so that the members of the House will have an opportunity to peruse them, as the Public-Lands Committee has already acted upon the subject of the resolutions and have directed me to report the action of the same to the House, which I shall do as soon as I can get the floor for that purpose. I would therefore ask unanimous consent to have the resolutions printed in the RECORD of to-morrow.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The concurrent resolution is as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 5, relating to lands conveyed to the State of Kansas in aid of a certain railroad, and which have subsequently reverted to the United States.

United States.

Whereas, by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1863 certain lands were granted to the State of Kansas for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from the city of Leavenworth, by the way of the town of Lawrence and the Ohio City crossing of the Osage River, to the southern line of the State, in the direction of Galveston Bay, in Texas, with a branch from Lawrence, by the valley of the Wakarnsa Eiver, to the point on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad where said road intersects the Neosho River; and whereas said act contained a proviso, in the words following, to wit: "That, if any part of said road and branches is not completed within ten years from the passage of this act, no further sale shall be made, and the land unsold shall revert to the United States;" and whereas the State of Kansas, by act of Legislature approved February 9, 1864, accepted said grant and assumed the execution of the trust; and whereas the said period of ten years has elapsed, and said railroad has not been completed, nor has Congress extended the time for such completion; and whereas a large portion of land included within said grant and lying within the limits of the State of Kansas insold, and is not open to settlement; and whereas the declaration of forfeiture and assertion of ownership alone abide in the legislative authority of the Government: Therefore.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Kansus, (the sencte therein concurring.) That we respectfully request the Congress of the United States to declare said lands forfeited and to take such legislative action as may be necessary to render them subject to entry under the pre-emption and homestead laws of the United states.

That we respectfully solicit our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence to secure such action as may effect the desired result.

That the secretary of state is hereby instructed to furnish a copy of this preamble and resolution to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of Kansas.

I hereby certify that the above resolution was adopted by the house January 21,

HENRY BOOTH, Chief Clerk.

Concurred in by the senate January 29, 1876.

JOHN H. FOLKS,

I, Thomas H. Cavanaugh, secretary of state of State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the great seal of State. Done at Topeka this 5th day of February, A. D. 1876.

THOS. H. CAVANAUGH. Secretary of State.

FISH-WAY OVER GREAT FALLS OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. O'BRIEN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Maryland, for the erection of a fish-way over the Great Falls of the Potomac, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas it is of the greatest importance to the States of Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and the District of Columbia that the shad, salmon herring, rock, and other migratory fish, which form already so large a proportion of the food-resources of the States and District named, and are destined to be a yet greater source of sustenance and revenue to the said States and District, should have an opportunity to reach the upper waters of the Potomae and its tributaries, not only that they may there find their appropriate spawning-beds, but also that the inhabitants of the States named, living upon such upper waters, may have the advantage and benefit of the yearly migration of such fish as well as those who dwell upon the lower waters of these States named and said District of Columbia; and whereas it is impossible for such fish to reach said upper waters on account of the impassability of the Great Falls of the Potomac, unless there be built a fishway to enable such fish to go around said falls, and so get to the upper waters of the Potomac and its tributaries; and whereas at a convention of the commissioners of fisheries of the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, held in Philadelphia on the 26th day of January, A. D. 1876, a resolution was passed declaring the necessity of the erection of a fish-way over the Great Falls of the Potomac, and urging action by the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fish-cries; and whereas it appears from the report of the Commissioner of Fisheries of this State that it is entirely practicable to erect a fish-way at that point:

Bett resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That the Senators of this State be instructed, and its Representatives in Congress requested, to urge upon the Congress of the United States the passage of such measures as will secure the erection of the same by the Government of the United States, and the appropriation of the necessary funds for such purpose.

And be it resolved, That a copy o

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. GAUSE presented a memorial of the Washington National Monument Society, asking an appropriation by Congress for the completion of the monument; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriatious, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, corporators of the Washington National Monument Society,

Your memorialists, corporators of the Washington National Monument Society, respectfully represent—

That the Continental Congress, after the proclamation of the peace which terminated the revolutionary war, on the 7th of August, 1783, resolved unanimously, "That an equestrian statue of General Washington be erected at the place where the residence of Congress shall be established." On the pedestal the following words were to have been engraved, "The United States in Congress assembled ordered this statue to be erected in the year of our Lord 1783, in honor of George Washington, the illustrious Commander-in-Chief of the Armies of the United States of America during the war which vindicated and secured their liberty, sovereignty, and independence."

of America during the war which vindicated and secured their liberty, sovereignty, and independence."

That on the 24th of December, 1799, Congress passed a resolution that a marble monument be erected in the city of Washington to the memory of the Father of his Country, which resolution still remains unexecuted.

On the 8th of May, 1890, the House of Representatives passed a resolution "that a manusleum be erected for George Washington in the city of Washington."

On the 1st of Jannary, 1891, the House of Representatives passed a bill appropriating $290,000 for the erection of the mausoleum.

In 1833 the Monument Society was formed for the purpose of erecting "a great national monument to the memory of Washington at the seat of the Federal Government."

In 1833 the Monument Society was formed for the purpose of erecting "a great national monument to the memory of Washington at the seat of the Federal Government."

John Marshall was its first president. He was succeeded by James Madison, who in accepting the position said: "A monument worthy of the memory of Washington, reared by the means proposed, will commemorate at the same time a virtue, a patriotism, and a gratitude of which our country may always be proud."

January 31, 1848, Congress recognized the national character of the work of the society by granting authority to the society to erect the monument upon a site in the public grounds to be selected by the President of the United States and the managers of the society.

July 4, 1848, the corner-stone was laid in the presence of the President and Vice-President, heads of Executive Departments, Senators and Representatives, executive, judicial, and military and naval officers of the United States. numerous civic societies, and a countless multitude of citizens from every quarter of the Union. Ex-President John Quiney Adams had accepted the duty of pronouncing the oration on the occasion, but owing to his death his place was taken by Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

For seven years the work progressed until the monument had risen to the height of one hundred and seventy-four feet, at a cost of about $240.000, when the funds of the society became exhausted and the work was suspended. From 1855 to the present time the society has continued its efforts to raise by voluntary contributions the required amount to enable them to proceed with the work, but without success. The approach of the Centennial inspired them with the hope that the patriotic feeling and national pride of their fellow-citizens might be aroused to a sense of the disgrace which would fall upon us in the eyes of the visitors from all quarters of the globe, whom we had invited to our shores to participate in our national jubilee, if we should leave in the national capital a standing insult to the memory of the man to whom, under Providence, we were mainly indebted for the independence and liberty to which our beasted progress is chiefly due. They have accordingly addressed a special appeal to the organized societies of the country to aid in raising the sum required to finish the monument.

Had their recent appeal fallen dead upon the country and yielded no fruits, they would have been inclined to despair of ever achieving success in the great undertaking which has been so long intrusted to their care. But the liberality and promptitude with which so many societies and other organizations have recognized the obligations of patriotism and the prompting of national pride in the matter of the monument have inspired the society with new hope and encouraged them to renew and urge with increased carnestness the solicitations which they have heretofore addressed to their fellow-citizens.

They submit herewith the responses which have been made by the leading organizations to their last appeal, and a list, necessarily incomplete, of the subscriptions received. No better index of the sentiment of the whole American people could be given than the expressions of the feelings of these great societies whose membership extends to every quarter of the land and everywhere embraces the great voting population of the country.

The American people, we feel justified in saying, are not only willing but anxious that this monument should be completed, and that the work should be in progress and at least approach completion duri g the centenary of our independence.

The society has put forth during the last year every exertion in its power to secure the means to continue and complete the great work they have so long had in hand, and they feel encouraged by the unanimity with which the public voice has declared in favor of the consummation of their labors. But they do not expect to be able to accomplish the task without the aid of Congress and they feel justified

Indeed, having no personal ends to serve, their only object being to secure the early completion of the monument, the society would be willing to have the work done under such contract and supervision as Congress in its wisdom should think best to provide, even though it involved their own relinquishment of the work to which they have been so long and so earnestly devoted.

Your memorialists forbear to give a reason why a monument should be raised to Washington. There is no true American to whom the great and venerable name of the Father of his Country does not suggest sufficient reasons for a monument to his memory.

of the Father of his Country does not suggest sufficient reasons for a monument to his memory.

It is an auspicious time now to complete it, when the doctrines he inculcated and of which he was in his person the most illustrious exponent again prevail over our whole country. While generations after generations shall look upon the monument to Washington, his great deeds will rise before them, and they will catch something of his spirit of patriotism; a patriotism not bounded by State lines, but embracing in its ample scope an indestructible union of many States.

The approach of our national centennial, when we have invited the nations of the earth to assist at our celebration, seems an appropriate occasion for a final appeal to Congress to fulfill the fledges so long unredeemed and pay to the memory of Washington the honor so long denied.

In conclusion, your memorialists respectfully pray that your honorable bodies will, on behalf of the people of the United States, carry into effect the resolution of December 24, 1799, and appropriate such sum toward the completion of the monument in the city of Washington as the previous action of Congress and the sense of the country may seem to require.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR CAPTIVE INDIANS.

Mr. SCALES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform this House as to the disposition made of the $300,000 appropriated heretofore by Congress for the benefit of captive Indians; whether all of said appropriation has been expended; and if not, whether the unexpended balance will be needed; and that he laso be requested to inform the House whether section 2088, page 367, of the Revised Statutes at Large of the United States, in relation to the appointment by the President of a military officer to be present at the delivery of all moneys and goods to be paid or delivered to the Indians, has been complied with.

RENT OF QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S BUILDING.

Mr. WILLIS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Amble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the Forty-third Congress at its first session passed the following enactment: "And hereafter no contract shall be made for the rent of any building, or part of any building, in Washington not now in use by the Government, to be used for the purposes of the Government until an appropriation therefor shall have been made in terms by Congress," approved June 22, 1574; and whereas it is represented that the building on the corner of G and Fifteenth streets, used for ten years for offices for the Quartermaster-General of the Army, was vacated on or about the 17th of last November and another building on the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and Fifteenth street leased for the same purpose:

Resoived, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House under whose direction and by what authority the Acting Quartermaster-General, Rufus Ingalls, leased the aforesaid building on the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and Fifteenth street, what time it is leased for, and the amount of rent to be paid yearly; also that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to this House true copies of all bills for material and labor paid by the post-quartermaster, Major Myers, acting quartermaster, including those approved and ordered to be paid by Acting Quartermaster-General Rufus Ingalls, on account of the building on the corner of Fifteenth and G streets to the condition stipulated between the owner and the Government; and that the Secretary of War also inform this House out of what fund appropriated for the Quartermaster-General's Office these amounts were paid.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair.) The Chair will state that it was his object in recognizing gentlemen from the several States to afford opportunity to every member to present such bills, joint resolutions, and memorials as were entitled to come in under the call now being had before the morning hour in its ex-tension should terminate. There are many members who have not in under the call now being had before the morning nour in its extension should terminate. There are many members who have not had an opportunity to present bills for reference, not being in when their States were called.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a question of order. Understanding from the Chair that the morning hour has expired and the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions has been completed, I would like to know whether the regular order of business is not would like to know whether the regular order of business is not now the call of States and Territories for resolutions under the suspension of the Rules?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in the power of any gentleman to call for the regular order of business.

Mr. KASSON. In order to avoid confusion, I believe it better to commence with the call of States for resolutions, under which call bills may also be introduced for reference.

SENATE AND HOUSE TELEGRAPH OPERATORS.

Mr. MacDOUGALL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and put on its passage a joint resolution (H. R. No. 70) fixing the pay of the telegraph operators of the Senate and House of Representatives at $1,440 per annum.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that joint resolution ought to be referred. to the Committee on Appropriations. It ought certainly to go to some committee before it is put on its passage. I object.

Mr. MacDOUGALL. Objection being made, let the resolution be referred to the Committee of Accounts.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee of Accounts.

LIGHT ON WATER-WORKS TOWER, CHICAGO.

Mr. CAULFIELD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2123) making appropriation for a light on the tower of the crib at the lake end of the tunnel of the water-works of the city of Chicago; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PURCHASE OF GOVERNMENT BONDS.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to examine into the expediency of passing an act directing the Secretary of the Treasury to defer, for a limited period, making any further reduction of the bonded indebtedness of the United States by purch sing Government bonds before they become due; this act not to conflict in the slightest degree with the act authorizing the refunding of the national debt, approved July 14, 1870.

This committee is also requested to examine into the propriety of directing the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue any further reduction in the volume or amount of legal-tender notes now in use.

And, further, the committee is requested to inquire into the expediency of directing the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue selling gold coin or bullion instead thereof. After paying the interest on Government bonds regularly, let the balance accumulate in the Treasury until it reaches — millions of dollars; and whenever there is a reasonable excess over said amount, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to exchange said excess of coin for legal-tender notes, not to be canceled or destroyed, but to be re-issued and paid out for demands against Government, as he now does under existing laws. And report by bill or otnerwise.

BUREAU OF PENSIONS.

Mr. JENKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be authorized to call for witnesses and papers, for the purpose of inquiring into the conduct of the Burean of Pensions and the disbursement of funds appropriated thereto.

CLAIMS UNDER ACT OF JULY 4, 1864.

Mr. RIDDLE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General of Subsistence be, and they are hereby, requested to report to the House of Representatives the aggregate amount of claims allowed and rejected in their respective Departments under the act of July 4, 1864, and the acts amendatory thereto, in the States of Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania; and, also, the aggregate amount of claims allowed and rejected under said law and the amendments thereto in the Southern States to which the law applies.

Mr. DÜNNELL. I object.

Mr. RIDDLE. I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution adopted.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a question of order. If we are acting as within the morning hour, a single objection to a resolution carries it

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the morning hour has terminated and a motion to suspend the rules is in order. Before the motion is put, the Clerk will again report the resolution.

Mr. KELLEY. I rise to a point of order. I suggest that the inquiry should be addressed to the Secretary of War and not to his subordinates. I suggest that the gentleman from Tennessee make that amend-

Mr. RIDDLE. I accept the amendment.
The SPEAKER. The resolution will be so modified.
Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw my objection to the resolution. There being no further objection, the resolution was adopted.

SESSION OF THE HOUSE ON SATURDAY.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the rules be suspended and the following resolution adopted:

Resolved, That on Saturday next, the 19th instant, the House shall meet for the reading of the Journal and debate only, no vote to be taken other than on the question of adjournment.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

SUPERINTENDENCY OF BATTERIES AT PORTSMOUTH HARBOR.

Mr. BANNING. I move that the rules be suspended and the following resolution adopted:

Resolved. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, required to furnish the House with a copy of all letters and charges now on file in the office of the Chief of Engineers, General A. A. Humphreys, with all the indorsements and recommendations made thereon, asking the removal of Robert Sarthorf, superintendent of batteries at Portsmouth Harbor, in the State of New Hampshire, and each and all of the papers connected with said removal, and the appointment of William Flynn, of South Berwick, Maine, in his place.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1873.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama, moved that the rules be suspended and the following concurrent resolution adopted:

Whereas from information derived from the Commissioner of Agriculture there are about 10,000 copies of the Agricultural Report for the year 1873 undistributed: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein,) That the Commissioner of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to each Senator and member of the House of Representatives twenty-five copies of said report, including the number heretofore delivered to members of Congress during the present session.

Mr. GARFIELD. That should be "excluding."
Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. No, sir; "including." I ask unanimous consent to make a brief explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to agreeing to the resolution?

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

SECTION 162 OF REVISED STATUTES

Mr. REA, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2126) to enforce section 162 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL B. OLMSTEAD.

 Mr. STRAIT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2127) to direct that patents be issued to Samuel B. Olmstead for certain lands in the State of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY PLOWMAN.

Mr. STRAIT also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2128) for the relief of Henry Plowman; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. PLATT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee on Printing be, and are hereby, required to examine and report to the House if there have been such material alterations of the debates before printing in the RECORD as require action by the House; also, if remarks have been altered or suppressed by others than the members making them.

BUILDINGS RENTED TO EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. On behalf of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service I offer the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask its passage

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Secretaries of the Treasury, of the Navy, of War, and of the Interior, and the Postmaster-General, be, and are hereby, respectively requested to report to this House a full statement of all buildings and grounds in the city of Washington now rented for the use of said Departments respectively, giving, first, a sufficient description of each piece of property that it may be easily identified, with street and number in each case; second, the date of such leases respectively, the name or names of the lessor or lessors in each case, the amount of the annual rent secured to be paid by said leases respectively, and the number of years for which said leases are respectively to run, the purposes for which such buildings and grounds are severally used; fourth, whether the said buildings are respectively fire-proof or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest that the resolution should include also the Department of Justice.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I agree to that, and will insert the Department of Justice in the resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

HARBOR AT SAINT JOSEPH, MICHIGAN,

Mr. POTTER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, requested to transmit to this House a copy of the report of the board of engineer officers recently convened at Saint Joseph, Michigan, to examine and report upon the location of the railroad bridge across that harbor and its effect upon navigation.

FRAUDULENT IMPORTATION OF WOOL.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish to the House of Representatives, at his earliest convenience, all information in the possession of the Treasury Department respecting recent fraudulent importations, or attempted fraudulent importations, of wool, with all correspondence from merchants, manufacturers, or importers in relation thereto.

CURRENCY AND SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following preamble and resolution, and move that the rules be suspended and that they be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the currency now in use among the people of the United States consists of the national-bank notes and the greenbacks, the latter being a debt of the Government widely distributed among the people, and the former being redeemable in the greenback and subject to like fluctuation with it; and whereas the United States Treasury has thus far failed to meet its obligations and to redeem its notes, thereby depreciating the value of the people's money and keeping it at a large discount, which depreciation varies from day to day, causing risk and uncertainty in business affairs, to the great prejudice of all legitimate industry and enterprise; and whereas Congress by its enactments and both the political parties by resolutions adopted in their several national conventions stand committed to the early resumption of specie payments: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That prompt measures should be taken by such legislation as is needed to render effective the policy to a resumption of specie payments, by placing in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury all necessary powers to carry out said objects, to the end that a sound and stable currency may be provided for the people.

Mr. MORPISON. It trust the gentleman will allow that resolution

Mr. MORRISON. I trust the gentleman will allow that resolution to go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. PAGE. O, no.

Mr. HALE. I think we had better have an expression of the opinion of the House upon it. We want to see whether caucusing has done our friends on the other side some good.

The question was taken on Mr. HALE's motion by a vice voce vote; and the Speaker stated that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HALE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to ask whether this resolution—
The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order; the Clerk will call the

Mr. OLIVER. I desire to know whether we are not voting to suspend the rules and not on the adoption of the resolution?

Mr. OLIVER. On both at once.

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly, on both at once.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I desire to raise the point of order that the rules must first be suspended before we can vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 85, nays 139, not voting 65; as follows:

During the roll-call, Mr. HOUSE said: My colleague, Mr. Young, is absent on a committe, and my colleague, Mr. ATKINS, is detained from the House by indisposition. If present, they would both vote "no."

Mr. COCHRANE. I desire to state that I am paired upon this question with my colleague, Mr. O'NEILL. I do not know how he would vote if present, but, being paired with him, I decline to vote.

Mr. MAISH, (having voted.) I am assured that my colleague, Mr.
Ross, with whom I am paired, would have voted "ay" on this quesion, if present, and therefore, I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. BLAND. My colleague, Mr. HATCHER, is detained from the House by sickness in his family. If present he would vote "no."

Mr. STEVENSON. I am paired upon this question with my colleague, Mr. HURLBUT. If he were here I would vote "no" and he would vote "ay." And I desire to say further that my colleague, Mr. Anderson, has been called home by important business; if here he would vote no.

Mr. REAGAN. My colleague, Mr. Mills, requested me to state that he was called home yesterday by the sickness of a relative, and if this is the proper time I would ask leave of absence for him for three or four days.

The SPEAKER. That can be done at the proper time.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to make the motion to adjourn. Before doing so, however, I desire to make a statement. I see by the New York Herald of to-day that an interpretation has been given to my remarks in connection with the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill which I never intended. I stated that the American flag had been illegally used within the limits of the consulate of Ningpo. I am made to appear as having made that charge against Mr. Lord, the United States consul at Ningpo. I made the statement upon the authority of Mr. Keim, and I ask permission to have printed in the attnorty of the entire letter from which I quoted, and it will then be seen that the charge is just as I intended to make it, against the consul-general. In the haste of speaking I used the word "consul" instead of "consulgeneral." Ningpo is within the consul-generalship, but Mr. Lord is only the consul.

I am thus prompt in making this explanation, because it has always been my pleasure never to offend if possible to avoid it, and always to correct any error I may have fallen into. I do not consider that this is any error of mine, but in the abundance of caution, and in the full wish to be always right, I ask that the entire letter of Mr. Keim be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER I object for the reason—
Mr. RANDALL. Then I will insert it as a portion of my remarks. The gentleman cannot object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has the right to do that

The letter is as follows:

SHANGHAI, CHINA, December 23, 1870.

SIR: In my dispatch dated at this port, December 22, 1870, I confined myself entirely to matters which appertained to the consulate-general as such. I would respectfully call your attention in this supplementary dispatch to transactions which have been brought to my notice, and which relate more particularly to the respectfully call your attention in this supplementary dispatch to transactions which have been brought to my notice, and which relate more particularly to the consul-general.

I would greatly have preferred examining the accusations personally, but, as I had no expressed authority to make investigations where I might think necessary, under oath, I saw at once that I could accomplish nothing of a satisfactory character. In several cases to which I did allude, the consul-general resorted so clearly to evasion that I was strengthened in my belief that there must be some foundation for what had been mentioned to me. The persons giving the information have long been residents in the East, and have had more or less business with the consul-general. Their statements I consider worthy of recognition, if for no other purpose than to lay the foundation for further investigation.

The irregularities to which I found it necessary to call your attention and other circumstances led me to suppose that there were other matters which would not appear in the consulate, but with regard to which it was my duty to inquire about. It was clear to me that the consul-general during his residence here had derived a large revenue from some source. It was equally patent that that revenue did not come exclusively from his compensation as consul-general. If that revenue did not come exclusively from his compensation as consul-general. If that revenue did not conflict with his official duties, it was no matter of mine to inquire further; if it did, I considered that the facts, if accessible, should be known. The revenues from "unofficial fees" I alluded to in my former dispatch and explained how they were applied.

The following are the transactions from which it is alleged the consul-general derived pecuniar, benefit contrary to law and the tariff of consular fees, and of which no account was rendered to the Government:

First. The granting of the American flag to a number of Ningpo (native) boats and native craft. In this species of enter Frederick Jenkins. son of the interpreter to the United States consulate-general; A. N. Shearer, subsequently, that is, in the years 1366-67-68, in the United States custom-house, New York, and, I learn, a son-in-law of Mr. Smith, former consul at Shanghai, and Benjamin Wardell, of Wardell & Co., at last accounts Water street near Wall street, New York.

W. B. Porter, at one time connected with this consulate, is also mentioned as having some knowledge of the consulate-general, and the actions of the present consulatences.

and the accounts Mr. Porter was with Johnston & Higgins, average adjusters and marine lawyers, Wall street, New York. It is charged that the consul-general permitted the use of the flag on lorchas for a consideration of $250 or thereabouts per lorcha per annum, for which he gave no receipt. This was an item, from what I learn, amounting to many thousand dollars to the consul-general per annum. Second. The granting of licenses for drinking an 1 boarding houses in Honque, or the American concession, for which the consul-general received compensation. Owing to the rigid regulations governing the English concession, it was impossible to scenre licenses for such establishments in that quarter. The consul-general at the time having exclusive jurisdiction over the American concession, such establishments were permitted to be set up in those limits, it is alleged, for the consideration stated. It is a notorious fact that the American concession, under the protection of the American flag, became the seat of every species of vice and crime.

the protection of the American flag, became the seat of every species of vice and crime.

The existence of a state of things so outrageous could no longer be endured. Under the pressure of a common outcry from the reputable foreign residents at the port, in the autumn of 1863, the American concession was incorporated with the English for all municipal purposes, though extensive powers still remained in the consul-general of the United States. This action restored order, by putting a check upon the iniquities which prevailed under the previous system.

Third. The building until recently occupied as the consular office was owned by Mr. Warden, superintendent of Russell & Co., an American firm, then agent of N. L. and G. Griswold, of New York. It was leased by one S C. Woodruff, shipchandler. The brother of the consul-general, then a mere boy, and employed in the consulate, it is stated, became a partner with Woodruff. The latter failed. The lease was sold, and bought up by a representative of the consul-general.

Fourth. In a case of mixed arbitration on the collision of the Moro Castle, an American vessel, with two junks, about October last, Lieutenant-Commander Wheeler, United States Navy, and the harbor-master of Shanghai were two of the arbitrators. The consul-general was called in as a third, the first two failing to agree. The captain of the Moro Castle paid for three arbitrators. The two arbitrators first named state that they received nothing for their services up to date, though allowed compensation by the rules in such cases.

Fifth. That the seamen's fund to the amount of many thousands of dollars was allowed to accumulate in the consulate-general. It is alleged that this was used for purposes of speculation at from 1 to 2 per cent. a month. The suggestion which the consul-general states he made last winter, that this fund should be turned over to the Treasury Department at Washington, at this late day seems intended as a check to inquiry as to the use of this fund while in his possession.

general, in which it is alreged more than the authorized fee for shipping seamen was charged.

I will also add that, during my stay at this port, the consul-general took possession, for his own residence, of the late consular building, with the intention of occupying the whole, except probably one room, as he has stated. For this building the Government pays as follows:

Office-rent	168

In lieu of this building, he has taken a smaller one, not in the least as creditable a place as the one abandoned. The new building at the utmost would not be worth over $50 per month rent.

As I have already said, had I been possessed of sufficient powers, I could have ascertained their tru h for all practical purposes. It is a notorious fact here that the consul-general, who was barely of age upon his arrival at Shanghai in 1862, had no means, apparently, save his pay from the Government.

The case is evidently quite the reverse at present. I am led to believe from the sources mentioned he derived personal benefit. If this be correct, the consul-general at Shanghai has been guilty of a serious violation of his office.

It is due to the Government, in my opinion, that a proper investigation be made.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

DE B. RANDOLPH KEIM,

Agent of the United States, &c.

Hon. George S. Boutwell. Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into the necessity of repaving Pennsylvania avenue from the Capitol grounds to Fifteenth street; to ascertain the best material to be used, the cost of the same, and the proportionate amount to be borne respectively by the United States and property-holders along said avenue; and to report by bill or

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the

Mr. MORKILL, or Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 811) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1877.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was in lines 7 and 8 to strike out the words "$12,800,000;" in line 9 to strike out "$14,100,000" and insert the word "and;" and in line 11 to strike out "one million five" and insert "twenty-eight million four;" so as to read:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877: Pensions for Army invalids, for widows, minors, and dependent relatives, and for survivors and widows of the war of 1812, $22,400,000, including such contingent expenses as may be authorized by the Commissioner of Pensions; fees for preparing vouchers and administering oaths, $250,000; fees of examining surgeons, $100,000; compensation to pension agents and the expenses of the several pension agencies, $200,000 as provided under the act of June 6, 1874, and of March 3, 1873; also for furnishing artificial limbs or apparatus for resection, with transportation or commutation therefor, $50,000.

Mr. DAVIS. As is known, I am a member of the Committee on Mr. DAVIS. As is known, I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but I disagree with the amendments reported by that committee to this bill. My judgment is that the amendments ought not to be concurred in by the Senate. The House, as it will be observed, passed the bill designating how this $23,400,000 should be appropriated, $12,800,000 for Army invalids, $14,100,000 for widows, minors, and dependent relatives; $1,500,000 for survivors and widows of the war of 1812, &c. The amendment consolidates these items. The object is the same in both cases. I am in full sympathy with the bill, but I think that the items of appropriation should be kept separates and distinct. In the Book of Estimates the Department separates the items and recommends just the amount that the House has proposed, and in the way the House has proposed. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, owing to some reason which the chairman no doubt will give in the department of back leaves the latest that the senate of the s man no doubt will give in the department of book-keeping, thought it best to consolidate the items. My impression is, after carefully examining the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, that the bill should be passed as it has come from the House in this particular. Therefore I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendments recommended by the committee. The amount is the same in both cases. There is no difference in that respect, but it conforms with the Book of Estimates to have the bill remain as the House have sent it to us.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will make a brief statement in regard to this matter. The bill as it comes from the House of Representatives appropriates about the same sum as last year, or rather a slightly tives appropriates about the same sum as may year, or racher a signify smaller sum. Now, what are the amendments of the committee † By the bill as it comes from the House the items of expenditure for widows, minors, and dependent relatives, for Army invalids, and for survivors and widows of the war of 1812 are distinct. The Senate committee has amended the bill so as to blend them all together.

That has been the way in which these appropriations have been made heretofore. The object is this: If you separate them, you make as many distinct accounts as you have subjects. It will be seen that the subjects are germane; that they all really form one subject. the subjects are germane; that they all really form one subject. When you classify them you make so many different accounts and of course you add very much to the labor both in the Pension Office and throughout the whole country at all the pension agencies. That is all the difference, and precisely what it is.

Mr. EATON. I would like to ask the Senator from Maine if the amendments change the amount appropriated?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not in the slightest.

Mr. EATON. In no particular?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In no particular whatever. We have adopted the hill so it comes to us from the House of Representatives.

adopted the bill as it comes to us from the House of Representatives, upon examination found to conform to the estimates and according to the statements of the Department; but this change is a mere transposition of the classification. Instead of specifying each class, we group them. The amendment is in harmony with the methods which have always obtained, and we have no information on the subject that any difficulty has grown out of it. The proposition is made for the purpose of obviating the necessity of several classes of accounts. The expenditures relate only to pensions. As to expenditures for pension agents and the like, we have followed the order adopted by the House of Representatives, which was to classify them and make them distinct, as that would not necessarily incur any additional expenditure the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate followed the secadopted the bill as it comes to us from the House of Representatives, ture, the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate followed the action of the House; but we are entirely satisfied, on a careful examination of the whole case, that there would be no security to the public by adopting the new method, and we followed the old and uniform way of doing it, believing that the method adopted by the House, which I think is imperfect, would increase the labors, both in the Pension Office and also at the pension agencies in the country at large.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations perhaps has not examined the pension report. If he will turn to page 5, he will find that the accounts are now kept separately. On page 5 we find that the Army invalid pensions for the fiscal year 1874 cost $10,055,654.90 and for 1875 $10,961,218. So the report goes on to give the amounts paid to Army widows, survivors of the war of 1812, the widows of 1812, the Navy invalids, and the Navy widows. The accounts are all kept separate now in the Department, and have been kept that way, as I understand, from the beginning of the Government.

Further, the numbers on the rolls of the last year and previous years are reported in separate items, and not consolidated, and in the estimates submitted by the Department for the present year you will find that they are separated there. In the Book of Estimates they are net consolidated, as is proposed now by the Committee on Appropriations, but are separated, as the bill passed the House.

I conceive that it is much the best way to separate them from the fact that we then always know just what each division costs (for they are paid in divisions) in the Bureau of the Commissioner of Pensions. There are six classes: Army invalids; Army widows, minors, and dependent relatives; survivors of the war of 1812; widows of the soldiers of the war of 1812; Navy invalids; and Navy widows, minors, and dependent relatives. In total there are 234,821 persons on the pension-list, and the reason why the classes ought to be kept separate I can readily assign.

If you take up the pension-roll you will find that for the year 1875 it includes 234,821 pensions, and the amount paid in the total, though it is separated into six different classes, reached $23,259,519 59. Now if you take the actual amount asked for in this bill to be appropriated you will find that it is $29,500,000 or $3,200,000 more than the actual roll calls for. So there was a difference in last year of over $3,000,000, or, to be exact, $3,393,692.04 between the roll of pensioners and the amount expended for pensions. This $3,300,000 is expended in some way or other; for it does not go, according to the report of the Commissioner, to the pensioners. I will say here that the entire expense of the Pension Department in Washington is provided for by the legislative and executive appropriation bill and not paid for out of the appropriations in this bill. The $3,303,000 for 1875 was therefore for other purposes than to pay pensioners on the pen-sion-roll proper and the clerical force which includes three hundred and eighty-five persons employed here in the Pension Office. They are paid from an appropriation in the legislative and executive appropriation bill, which is entirely independent of this appropriation.

Mr. EATON. What becomes of that $3,393,000?

Mr. DAVIS. The chairman has a letter on that subject. I called Mr. DAVIS. The chairman has a letter on that subject. I called on the Commissioner of Pensions and had probably three conversations with him to know why this great difference was, which resulted in not a very satisfactory explanation to myself and also in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, which no doubt will be read, stating what in his judgment became of it, but I failed to see that it was all accounted for. It is true that some six or seven hundred thousand dollars of it is accounted for by the payment of pension agents and fees, and commissions at different places throughout the country. There are fifty-eight rension agents and that would out the country. There are fifty-eight pension agents, and that would make each one get a little less than $8,000 for his expenses, fees, &c. There are some other expenses, of course, some limited expenses, such as printing blanks and one thing and another, which account for part of the sum, but the large amount of $2,800,000, according to my recollection, is accounted for in gross as having been added to the pension-roll for pensions to persons who were added during the year or increased pensions; but it was my thought, and it is yet, and upon examination I state that the deaths, the remarriages, and the minors coming of age ought to fully balance the new pensioners coming on the rolls, and the facts prove that the pension-roll has decreased last year between one and two thousand persons.

These amendments make no difference in the gross amount, but by These amendments make no difference in the gross amount, but by keeping the accounts separate and distinct it will always be known to Congress and to the country just what each division of pensioners costs the Government. I believe that it is far the best to keep these pension accounts separate, as provided in the bill that comes from the House, and not to consolidate them. Evils might grow out of this consolidation. True, it may be an extreme case to suppose so, but on the same principle you might say the Government costs $200,000,000 to run and just appropriate the entire amount. Certainly that would be dangerous. I think we ought not to agree to the amendments of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend undoubtedly thinks so; but if it added anything to the public security in any way I should not disagree with him about it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to ask the chairman, before he passes on, what objection is there to appropriating the money as provided by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That I tried to state when I was up before, but I suppose my honorable friend was not in his seat. The only objection in the world is that it compels the Office to keep separate accounts of each class of items. Instead of one class relating to the whole subject of invalid and other pensions, it requires a separate account and separate books to be kept of each. That is all there is of it so far as the Department is concerned.

Mr. COCKRELL. Permit me to ask a question. The Senator from West Virginia has said that they already keep their accounts separate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator undoubtedly thinks so. Mr. COCKRELL. How, then, will this increase the labor? That Mr. COCKRELL. How, then, will this increase the labor? That is the question I wish to ask.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So I understand. The Senator undoubtedly thinks so. The Bureau know what they pay out to each class, but they only keep one set of books, whereas if the bill passes as it came from the House they would require separate books for each class. I am not an expert in the manner of book-keeping at the Bureau, but I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a communication from the Commissioner of Pensions, which is the information we have in regard to the inconvenience of the proposed method of keeping the books.

Before the letter is read, however, I wish to say while I am up that

Before the letter is read, however, I wish to say while I am up that, in addition to the inconvenience and labor which I understand by this bill would be imposed on the Department, the same difficulty would extend to the country service as to the pension agents. Now these pension agents draw money from the Treasury Department on requisitions which they make near the close of each quarter, in which they specify the amount of money they will need to cover the pensions of their particular districts. They draw the aggregate sum. For instance, in the city of Saint Louis, where the payments are pretty large, probably a million of dollars, if they were required to specify how much precisely it would take for each class, they would be unable to do that precisely, because the pensioners are constantly changing—changing by death, changing by absence, by going to another part of the State, another district, &c. So there would be a difficulty about that, and, as you will see by this communication from the Commissioner of Pensions, they never could know precisely the amount they should send to a pension agent. They would either have to send a larger amount than they would like to send, and than was necessary, or they might come short in one of the particular classes owing to the inability of the pension agent at any particular time to indicate the precise amount that might be required for each class.

This, together with the book-keeping, was the chief difficulty which pension agents draw money from the Treasury Department on requi-

This, together with the book-keeping, was the chief difficulty which led the committee to conform to the old method in this respect of making the appropriation. That is all there is in it. It is not very important so far as security to the public is concerned. The whole of it rather relates to a matter of convenience and expense as to keeping the books in the Commissioner's Bureau.

Mr. EATON. I do not quite see the force of the honorable Senator's Mr. EATON. I do not quite see the force of the nonorable Senator's remarks. He takes the pension agent at Saint Louis. If the pension agent at Saint Louis can inform the Department how much he wants, if he desires $3,550,000, he certainly can tell how much he wants for each department of his agency; else he cannot make up the whole amount.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my honorable friend will allow me, the difficulty is that there are six distinct classes. If he were required to make his requisitions on the Treasury for precisely what he wants for each class, it would be impossible for him to tell.

Mr. EATON. How then can he tell how much he wants in gross?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He cannot tell exactly what he wants in gross; he never can tell; there may be a little surplus. But the difficulty is that if we make the appropriation for each class it must in gross; he never can ten; there may be a none surplus. Due the difficulty is that, if we make the appropriation for each class, it must be paid to each class specifically, and if he does not draw precisely the amount that we have allowed for each class, and it falls short, then, as a matter of course, he has not the funds; he has to make another requisition, because the money must be paid out precisely as it is appropriated. Does my honorable friend understand it? That is all there is of it. My friend from California [Mr. SARGENT] suggests that meanwhile the pensioner must be delayed. Anybody can see that this is not a very vital matter in any way. It is simply a matter touching the convenience of the distribution of this fund, and that convenience or inconvenience extends as well to the Department of the Interior as to the country at large. Now I ask to have the communication read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be reported. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Department of the Interior, Pension Office,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1876.

Sir: I beg to call your attention to the construction of House bill 811, making appropriations for the payment of pensions for the year ending June 30, 1877, wherein itemized appropriations are made for each class of pensioners and each specific purpose mentioned therein, instead of a single aggregate appropriation, as in the bills of previous years.

Much inconvenience, additional labor, and embarrassment will result if the appropriations are thus made. Separate accounts will have to be opened under each head and requisitions and remittances made under each. An agent now paying Army pensions has a single remittance made to him from the appropriation for Army pensions, which he can use for the payment of any class of pensioners, as vouchers are presented, till exhausted. If specific appropriations are made for each class, a remittance from each appropriation will have to be made simultaneously to meet the demands of pensioners of each specific class. Should the remittance for any class of pensioners be insufficient, that class would be denied payment while others would be paid. This would cause much complaint and be difficult of satisfactory explanation. So, at the close of a fiscal year, the appropriations for a certain class, based upon a very close estimate, might by unexpected legislation or allowances be found insufficient while a more than ordinary decrease in the allowances to or number of pensioners of another class might leave a surplus of the appropriation for them, which could not be used to meet the deficiency in the other.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. M. ATKINSON, Commissioner.

Hon. Lot M. Morrill, Chairman Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I send to the Chair a further communication from the Commissioner of Pensions, and ask that that be read, as it is explanatory of what appears to be a discrepancy.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Chief Cierk read as 1010ws:

Department of the Interior, Pension Office,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1876.

Sir: I have the honor to submit the following explanation of items in my annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, upon which is based the estimate for appropriation asked for the approaching fiscal year, referring to the tables in report for a more detailed exhibit of the items embraced in each. The annual amount of all pensions on the Army-roll, as shown in table C, page 22, of report was.

$25, 816, 445 84

Annual amount of pensions on Navy-roll as in table G, page 25,

473, 473 75

These amounts are obtained from the tables showing the rates of pension and number to each rate of invalids, (K, pages 31, 32, and 33,) and tables of ranks and number to each rank of widows and dependent relatives, (O, page 37, and P, page 38,) adding $2 per month for each child. Pensions of the war 1812 are computed at $96 each.

The amount disbursed during the fiscal year was:

For Army pension, table B, page 21. $29, 162, 768 16
For Navy pensions, table F, page 24. $29, 348 47

29, 683, 116 63 amount disbursed, $29,683,116.63, is $3,393,597.04, which arises from expenses of disbursement, payments to examining surgeons, and payment of arrears of pension, as follows:

2010 00
1. Payments to pension agents:
For salaries	$212,740 06
For fees on vouchers	214, 523 00
For postage	9, 362 04
For office safe	575 00
For stationery	12, 830 39
For periodical, ordered, and special examinations	57, 291 36
For postage on accounts to this Office	1,086 01
3. Arrears of pension on claims admitted during the fiscal year, as follows:
Original Army, 10,212; original Navy, 284; increase Army, 15,410, and increase Navy, 151, amounting to	2, 885, 189 18

The annual amount of the roll for the present fiscal year will be but little, if any, less than that shown above, while the aggregate of the expenses of disbursement, payments to surgeons, and for arrears in admitted cases, will probably not differ materially from the figures given.

Very respectfully,

H. M. ATKINSON,

Hon. LOT M. MORRILL, United States Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it will be noticed that a very large amount, $2,800,000, is added in one lump by the letter from the Pension Bureau for increased pensions, making no allowance for deaths, remarriages, and children becoming of age, as between the roll and the amount actually expended. I made the best effort that I knew how to satisfy myself that that was correct and proper. I called at the Pension Office more than once, and with the best feeling toward the bill and with a sympathy for the pensioners I was willing to allow a great many dollars beyond what I could see myself; but the amount appears to be so large that to my mind it cannot be correct. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are $2,800,000 added to the roll for what are called increased pensions. It is a known fact that the pension-roll is decreasing; for instance, in the year just past, 1875, there are nearly twelve or thirteen hundred names less on the roll than there had been the previous year. They reached their maximum number five years ago, and have been decreasing each year since. Now, the decrease from deaths, remarriages, and minors becoming of age ought to be, and in my opinion is, greater than the becoming of age ought to be, and in my opinion is, greater than the increase; so that I am unable to see the reason for this great difference; and one of the aids I think in discovering it will be to keep these accounts separate. It will be noticed that they are now kept separate in fact. They are so in the Book of Estimates that the Department sends to us. They separate the items into dollars and cents, giving the precise amounts, showing that what is aimed at is already done in the Pension Bureau. My judgment is that it will cause increased carefulness and prevent these funds being put together in such a way that one can be used to pay another; and in many cases money go without properly accounting for it. The large amount of expenditure over the roll, which calls for $26,000,000, and the actual expenditure, $29,000,000, in round numbers, is $3,000,000, and that is too great a difference to be accounted for by increased pensions. is too great a difference to be accounted for by increased pensions. However, this is a question that involves no dollars as to the appropriation; but I shall follow this with additional amendments, which I understand the committee will agree with me in, providing some further guards.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not regard the objections of the Senator from West Virginia as vital. I was not present at the session of the Committee on Appropriations when this bill was considered; and I rise now to call attention to the vast increase of expense to the Govrise now to call attention to the vast increase of expense to the Government in getting to the pensioners the money we appropriate. We expend this year, if we follow the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions, nearly one and a quarter millions of so send twenty-nine millions of money to the pensioners. If we take the fiscal year 1867, we find that it cost us but about $1.70 per $100 to send money to the pensioners, while now it costs us $4.20. We find the expenses of the Pension Department proper during that year, in which there was sent $25,400,000 to the pensioners, to have been but $230,000, while now there is an appropriation asked for by the estimates of $490,000. There were then one hundred and seventy-five employés in this Department, while now we have three hundred and eighty-five. These are matters that seem to me to call for attention on the part of Congress and to be a subject upon which we can very properly of Congress and to be a subject upon which we can very properly make retrenchment. I do not desire to thrust it now on the attention of the Senate or interfere with the passage of this bill; but when the subject of the expenses of the Pension Department proper shall come before the Senate, I shall ask the Senate to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment of the committee is on page 2, lines 24, 25, and 26, to strike out—

Surgeon-General's Office, as provided under the act of June 18, 1874.

And to insert:

Surgeon-General of the Army, and in accordance with existing laws. So as to read:

Provided, That the same shall be expended and disbursed under the direction of the Surgeon-General of the Army, and in accordance with existing laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 27, to strike out "$190,000" and insert "and;" and in line 29 to strike out "335" and insert "525;" so as to make the clause read:

For Navy pensions, to invalids, and for widows and dependent relatives, $525,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 3, lines 39 and 40, to strike out "Surgeon-General's Office" and insert "Surgeon-General of the Army;" so as to read:

For furnishing artificial limbs or apparatus for resection, with transportation or commutation th refor, $2,000, which appropriation shall be expended under the direction of the Surgeon-General of the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. In line 12 we find after the word "dollars" the words "including such contingent expenses as may be authorized by the Commissioner of Pensions." The contingent expenses are part of the three millions I was talking about. I desire to throw additional safeguards about that. I move in line 13 to strike out "authorized" and insert "recommended" and after the words "Commissioner of Pensions" to insert "and approved by the Secretary of the Interior." The object of the amendment is that the Secretary of this office may have some supervision ever the contingent expenses of this office. may have some supervision over the contingent expenses of this office. May have some supervision over the contingent expenses of this office. As it is now, the Commissioner of Pensions alone has it in his discretion. The bill takes it from the head of his Department, as I understand, and gives it to him. I believe the committee, or at least the chairman whom I have consulted, concurs in this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. The amendment we have just made relates to the Army pensions. In lines 35 and 33 you will find the same provision as to the Navy pensions. I suggest that the same amendment be made there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, in line 35, to strike out the word "authorized" and insert "recommended" and after the word "pensions," in line 36, to insert "and approved by the Secretary of the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. It will be seen by the letter of the Commissioner, read this morning, that there would be no necessity for that explanation if it were not for the fact that in his annual report he does not give any account of his contingent expenses. There are upwards of $3,000,000 of contingent expenses in that office. Now, I think that, if he spends a thousand or a hundred thousand or a million dollars, the fact ought to be stated in his annual report. I have carefully examined his annual report, and there is nothing in it as to the contingent expenses, not even the amounts paid to pension agents or the surgeons who examine pensioners. It just goes in whosesale, so much. I propose, and on that I hope the committee will agree with me, something like this; I do not know that the exact wording is proper:

Hereafter it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions in his annual report to give a statement of the contingent expenses of the Pension Bureau.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. We can soon finish this bill.
Mr. SARGENT. I trust we shall be allowed to get through with this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to continuing the consideration of this bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to continuing the bill subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. SARGENT. The contingent expenses, properly so called, are very small, not only not $3,000,000, but probably not a tenth of that. I have no objection to the amendment as I understand it, but the Senator from West Virginia in his statement put the contingent expenses of the Pension Office at $3,000,000. Two million eight hundred thousand dollars of the sum stated by him are accounted for a sestated penses of the Pension Office at $5,000,000. Two million eight hundred thousand dollars of the sum stated by him are accounted for, as stated in the letter which has been read, by the increase of the roll caused by additionally allowed pensions, frequently by the legislation of Congress, which by a few lines, passed carelessly here, increase the cost of the roll two or three million dollars, bills which I have fought against and I think my friend from West Virginia has over and over again stood by me in opposing that careless legislation by high by again stood by me in opposing that careless legislation by hich by a few ill-considered lines the pension-roll is increased. While i believe in reasonable and fair pensions and that pensions should be extended to those who have suffered in serving the country, I do not elieve that Congress should be careless in doling out that justice.

The only thing I wished to remark on was the statement of my friend putting the contingent expenses at $3,000,000 when, as the Commissioner distinctly states, $2,800,000 of that amount is in one item by the increase of the pension-roll which is no more a contingent expense than is the original item of the pension-roll.

Mr. DAVIS. When I sent my amendment to the desk I said that some amendment like that ought to be made; it was hurriedly written, and I was not sure that it was worded correctly. If my friend from California or the chairman of the committee can amend my amendment so as to cover the ground that I wish to cover, I shall be That is, I want to know how the sum constituting the difference between the roll and the actual amount expended is expended. There is now no statement of such expenses given by the Commissioner of Pensions, and I believe that in all other Departments such statements are given. As to the phraseology, I have no choice; but statements are given. As to the phraseology, I have no choice; but I want to cover that ground.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do not the accounts in the Treasury Department show what the items of the contingent expenses of the Commissioner of Pensions are or how much the aggregate is?

Mr. DAVIS. I have not examined the accounts in the Treasury Department, and have not had an opportunity to do so. My friend well knows it would take me a year to do it. The point that I want to cover is that in the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions, where there is a difference between the roll of pensioners and the where there is a difference between the roll of pensioners and the actual amount expended, we ought to know how that difference is accounted for, whether it is a million or three millions of dollars—accounted for, whether it is a million or three millions of dollars—whatever the amount may be. I do not say the items should be given with detailed particularity; but it should be stated how the money is expended. I take it, it is expended properly, but I think the country and Congress ought to know how it is expended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I. I sympathize perfectly with the idea. My only inquiry was intended to be whether this is not making a duplication of the same duty; whether this officer is not now bound by law to report to his superior or to the Treasury Department his contingent expenses, and thus we get them before us through another channel. I merely rose for an inquiry on that noint. Certainly what channel. I merely rose for an inquiry on that point. Certainly what the Senator wishes to accomplish, in some way ought to be accom-plished. I think it must be the law now in some form.

plished. I think it must be the law now in some form.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no doubt the Senator is correct, that the expenses must go through some auditor; but in the report given to the country the amount of these contingent expenses should be stated. I know there are some reports that contain many items that I think it useless to publish. Perhaps it is only necessary to give what has been stated in the letter that was read this morning, that so much goes for fees to the pension agents, fifty-eight of them. As I have stated, there are fifty-eight pension agents; and, if you take the list for 1875, you will find that the offices of these men cost about $8,000 a piece on the average, some less probably and some a great deal more. If that be so, I think it ought to be stated in the Commission-

Mr. WRIGHT. I had an impression—I do not know that it reaches the case that the Senator from West Virginia refers to—that we had a general statute which covered this subject, as the Senator from Vermont has suggested. By reference to section 193 of the Revised Statutes of the United States it will be found that it is provided that-

The head of each Department shall make an annual report to Congress, giving a detailed statement of the manner in which the contingent fund for his Department, and for the Burcaus and offices therein, has been expended, giving the names of every person to whom any portion thereof has been paid; and if for anything furnished, the quantity and price; and if for any services rendered, the nature of such service, and the time employed, and the particular occasion or cause, in brief, that rendered such service necessary; and the amount of all former appropriations in each case on hand, either in the Treasury or in the hands of any disbursing officer or agent. And he shall require of the disbursing officer, acting under his direction and authority, the return of precise and analytical statements and receipts for all the moneys which may have been from time to time during the next preceding year expended by them, and shall communicate the results of such returns and the sums total, annually, to Congress.

I suggest that that covers the case.

Mr. DAVIS. If that be the law, and I suppose it is, why is it that in the pension report, which purports to represent the doings of that Office, there is not one word as to the expenditure of the sum that makes the difference between the amount the roll calls for and the amount actually expended? I want in the pension report a statement of what becomes of this large amount between what the roll calls for and the actual amount spent.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to my friend whether he has examined the report of the Secretary of the Interior to see whether this report has not been made.

Mr. DAVIS. I have.

Mr. WRIGHT. If it has been made, as it is required by law to be made, certainly there is no necessity for requiring it also from the Pension Bureau.

I take it that the Senator from Iowa, who is so well Mr. DAVIS. I take it that the Senator from Iowa, who is so well informed on all matters of this kind, knows that the Pension Commissioner's report comes through the Secretary of the Interior. It is in fact a part of his report. Now, if he will take that report and examine it carefully, he will see that there is not one word in it on this

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think there is a little confusion here, perhaps. The information which the Senator from West Virginia thinks should be in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions is always to be found on our table. It has been on our table this year, and is in detail, item by item. If I understand the Senator from West Virginia, he desires that the Commissioner should report the items of the contingent expenditures of his Office. If I understand him right that is what he means. There is no great objection to that. He does substantially state that always. The Senator wants it a little more specific. He says there is now about $3,000,000 as to which he does not precisely see how the Commissioner accounts for; but the letter the Commissioner sends here shows us how it is. He does not give us the items, but he explains precisely the sources of expenditure; and if anybody is desirious of knowing accurately and precisely what the items are, he can go to the report of the head of that Department whose duty it is, as shown by the Senator from Iowa, to give us in detail the particulars of the expenditures of any contingent fund.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He has given it this session, and it is in print now. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think I have seen it on our tables. Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand it is already in print from the In-

Mr. EDBACKDS. I didderstand to is already in print from the interior Department covering the expenses of this very Bureau.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Still the Senator from West Virginia thinks it would be a proper thing if the Commissioner of Pensions would state these sums, but not in detail, in his report which he is bound to make to the Secretary of the Interior. I understand that to be all that the amendment requires.

Mr. DAVIS. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has stated the substance of what I desire the pension report to contain. In other words, when we examine the report of the Commistain. In other words, when we examine the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, I want that of itself to explain this great difference, without having to go to some other report to find it. I want it there not in detail, but in substance as in his letter read this morning. Mr. WRIGHT. I do not know that there is any particular objection to this, but it does occur to me that, in view of this statute, the very thing that is sought here is required to be done now; and why shall we have a provision making it the special duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to do this and not apply to others as well? The law as it stands now requires the Secretary of the Interior to make this report not only of the contingent fund of his Department proper this report not only of the contingent fund of his Department proper, but of the contingent fund of every Bureau in his Department. That is required now, and not only the aggregate amount but the amount in detail as well. But if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations deems that there is no objection to the amendment, I shall not resist it, but it seems to me quite unnecessary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think that it is necessary, but

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think that it is necessary, but I do not see that it is particularly objectionable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will it not operate as a repeal, pro tanto as to the Pension Bureau, of the present provision of law which requires the Secretary of the Interior to give us the whole of the contingent-expense account of that Bureau? If by a later law we substitute a report from the Commissioner of Pensions alone, and leave that so indefinite, as the Senator from West Virginia wishes to do, as not to require a detailed statement but only a kind of generalized summary, I suppose, that would not be very expensive or very long, we run the risk of being told at some future session that the provision of law which the Senator from Iowa has read has been superseded by this other which is to take its place; and so instead of making an improvement we shall have gone downward in the line of enforcing accountability of public officers and get practically no information at all. I think there is some danger of this unless you put in a qualifying clause that this shall not be held to affect the present duty of these officers under the law to give us a detailed statement. I suggest that to the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator from West Virginia

Mr. Mothers, or Maine.

Accept that suggestion?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, I have in my hand the account of the contingent fund of the Pension Office for my hand the account of the contingent fund of the Pension Office for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1875, being contained in House of Representatives Executive Document 13 of the Forty-fourth Congress, transmitted by the Secretary of the Interior on the 7th of December, 1875, which contains a detailed statement, of course altogether too long to read, of what I suppose make up the very things which my friend from West Virginia desires to have accounted for about the contingent fund. It purports to cover all the contingent expenses. Now there is no objection to this amendment except the mere additional expense it involves, if we do not by this provision distributes a very superficiently as in law it.

disturb the existing one which does give us practically, as in law it ought, complete information.

Mr. DAVIS. I think we all agree practically. I have not said that such a statement was not published anywhere; but my point is that it ought to be in the Commissioner of Pension's report. the expense, it would not be worth thinking of because the statement would be short. Let the Clerk read the amendment as it has been modified

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to report to the Secretary of the Interior in his annual report a statement of the contingent expenses of the Pension Bureau, to be by said Secretary communicated to Congress.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest after the word "Bureau" to insert "as has been heretofore done" and strike out all that follows.

[Laughter.]

Mr. INGALLS. Would it not be better to say "in addition to the report now required by law?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Morrill] to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to say one word to my friend from West Virginia. By the amendment already made on the suggestion of that Senator this contingent fund is to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DAVIS. On the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, so far as the expenditure of the contingent fund is concerned, it is all to be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. I submit to my friend whether his antecedent amendments do not make this proposition unnecessary? Has he not secured now, by the direct supervision of the Secretary of the Interior over this contingent fund, all that he possibly can by this amendment? If so, it is not necessary.

Mr. DAVIS. That is so to a very great extent. We have put an additional safeguard around the expenditure, and, if the chairman believes that is all that is necessary, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think the Senator has accomplished all that he can accomplish by the other amendments. His first amendment holds the Secretary of the Interior directly responsible.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I withdraw the amendment; but I wish to say

Then I withdraw the amendment; but I wish to say Mr. DAVIS.

word on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.
Mr. DAVIS. I have two or three thoughts that I will throw out, not for the Committee on Appropriations, but for the Committee on Pensions; and I hope the chairman of that committee will hear me. I think that there ought to be some additional safeguards thrown around the Pension Bureau to prevent frauds upon it. I believe that a very considerable portion of the money purporting to be paid to pensioners is paid fraudulently and wrongfully. I doubt very much whether many of the persons who are entitled to pensions really get them; and very many, in one manner or another, get them who are not entitled to them.

It has occurred to me that the pension agents might possibly be dispensed with entirely, and pensioners be paid from the Pension Office here. Each pension agent costs about $3,000 a year on an average; and there are fifty-eight of them. The system now is that the money in bulk, so many hundred thousand dollars, is sent to the various pension agents over the country. The agent deposits it in bank or elsewhere to suit himself; he draws his check, and sends it to the pensioner, through the post-office, wherever he may be over the country. It has occurred to me that all that work could be done here in the Pension Office. The post-office address of every pensioner is upon the record here; and the money could be sent to the postmaster of the place with directions to deliver it to the pensioner himself, and in many cases the pensioner would not be found probably. I believe pension agents could be entirely done away with, and a Government draft sent to the pensioner direct, which would be worth more to him than the check of the pension agent, living no matter where through the country. Very often the pensioner has to pay to have that check cashed, while, if it was a Government draft on New York, he would never have to pay a discount to have it cashed.

I throw out these thoughts in hopes that the Pension Committee will think of them. Again, I think that the system of examining surgeons is very defective. If you will look at the pension report for last year you will find that there are thirteen thousand persons whose pensions have been raised. How is it done? The pensioner lives in the country, the surgeon lives near him; through sympathy and through influence, and for one reason or another, he is got to say the man is entitled to a higher pension than he gets, and so reports. The pensions always go up and never down. It occurs to me that some remedy ought to be applied there. If these subjects, the use of pension agents and the examination of pensioners, were looked into carefully, perhaps half a million of dollars yearly could be saved to the Gov-ernment and the entire work be done through the main office, instead of being scattered all over the country.

Mr. EATON. I beg to say to my friend from West Virginia that the committee which was organized last winter, of which the senior Senator from Massachusetts is chairman, have had that whole mat-ter under consideration, and when their report comes before the Sen-ate I have no doubt a great many thousand, not to say a great many hundred thousand dollars will be saved to the country if their report

Mr. DAVIS. That is in the right direction, and I am glad to hear it.
Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, in behalf of the Committee on Pensions, of which I have the honor to be chairman, I desire to extend our thanks to the Senator from West Virginia for the very valuable address he has made, so replete with information, on the subjects that pertain to that committee; and in response I would simply remark that if he had been more familiar with the course of legislation upon that subject he would have ascertained that upon the files of the Senate are already bills relating to the matters to which he has called our attention. Early in the session I introduced a bill, submitted as a projet from the Department of the Interior, for the appointment of forty special agents to investigate pension frauds. I believe with him forty special agents to investigate pension fractus. To eneve with him that very extensive wrongs are perpetrated upon this fund, and that a proper examination would show that of the twenty-nine or thirty millions of dollars that are paid annually to the pensioners of this Government at least five millions are fraudulently and improperly paid; that in consequence of recovery from disability, improper ratpaid; that in consequence of recovery from disability, improper ratings, payments to minors who have reached the age prescribed by law at which the pension shall cease, the remarriage of widows, false personations, and in various other ways that are familiar to the authorities and that are continually brought to our attention, at least one-sixth part of the entire amount that is paid to pensioners is fraudulently and wrongfully paid. I trust the Senator from West Virginia, whose desire I am sure is second to no member of the Senate for economy in the administration of our public affairs, will second the economy in the administration of our public affairs, will second the committee in their efforts to pass that bill for the appointment of agents to investigate these glaring and admitted frauds.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for my own information what the appropriation contained in the fourteenth and fifteenth lines of this bill is for? I that have no doubt he can give an explanation; and yet before I vote for the bill I should like to know, that I may vote intelligently on it. It is $250,000 for preparing vouchers and administering oaths. My supposition in regard to the vouchers and administration of oaths in order to entitle a party to a pension has been that the party prepared them at his own expense, so as to prove his title to the Department. I desire to know what youchers and administering of oaths this item refers to. I suppose it is to the investigations in the cases of fraud spoken of by the Senator from Kansas—to the vouchers taken in the investigation of fraudulent claims by pensioners of the Government. That I apprehend is the case; but I am not fully aware that it is, and I desire that information if I can get it from the Senator having and I desire that information, if I can get it from the Senator having charge of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That relates entirely to the preparation of the vouchers which are required by law to be taken on the payment of pensioners. Pretty much all the payments are made by checks; and certificates or vouchers are sent in in the first place, and the checks are sent out. It applies entirely to the expenses incurred in the preparations for the payment of pensioners at the pension

Mr. SAULSBURY. My supposition was that the claimants prepared at their own expense the vouchers for money to be drawn from this fund

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not that.
Mr. SAULSBURY. In reference to the matter of the special agents referred to by the Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, I think that there has been a service of that kind already in existence. I find in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions that the special agents examined some fifteen hundred and thirty claims during the last fiscal year.

Mr. INGALLS. Those have been merely details of clerks from the Mr. INGALLS. Those have been merely details of clerks from the Pension Bureau for the purpose of inquiring into certain alleged specific irregularities or frauds. The bill introduced by me contemplates the appointment of forty special agents whose duty it shall be to investigate those frauds and perform no other function under the

Mr. SAULSBURY. I find that on the investigation of fifteen hundred and thirty claims three hundred and nine were rejected; showing that one-fifth of the pension claims are fraudulent claims. saving to the Department, the report says, has been $144,000 by dropping the names of parties from the pension-roll, and by the recovery of part of the money which had been paid, and the rejection of claims that were fraudulent. Something, therefore, ought to be done in the direction indicated by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions. direction indicated by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions. Some steps ought to be taken to thoroughly investigate the pensionrolls. The honest pensioner ought to be paid; the fraudulent claimants ought to be rejected. According to that ratio, if one-fifth of the pension list is fraudulent, then the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas is very near right, and some five or six million dollars now appropriated to pensions are obtained by persons having no valid claim upon the fund. I hope that something will be done. Whether the bill of the Senator from Kansas to which he referred, for the appointment of special agents, is the appropriate mode to reach these great ment of special agents, is the appropriate mode to reach these great frauds on this fund, I am not able to say; but I hope that during the session some action will be taken so as to secure a thorough investigation of the entire pension-roll, so that none but those properly entitled to pensions may be permitted to draw upon this appropriation of something near $30,000,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Morrox,] who is entitled to the floor, to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary of a little bill, and I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate also to consider it at this time. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 353) to amend section 1911 of the Revised Statutes, instruct me to report it back with an amendment.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment was to strike out in line 5 the words "the laws of the United States" and insert "laws;" so as to make the

That section 1911 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by inserting the words "and laws" after the word "Constitution" in the latter clause of said section.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope the Senator will explain what that means. Mr. SARGENT. I hope the Senator will explain what that means. Mr. WRIGHT. I will explain it. By this section of the Revised statutes it has occurred that in the Territory of Washington, differing from their organic act and from the organic act and laws as applicable to all the other Territories, jurisdiction is not given to the courts of the Territory in matters arising under the laws of the United States, but the jurisdiction is confined to matters arising under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the Territory. The words "and laws" are omitted from that section of the statute conforming jurisdiction upon courts in Washington Territory. conferring jurisdiction upon courts in Washington Territory in cases arising under the Constitution of the United States. It is unmistakably an omission, and it is intended by this bill to remedy that difficulty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 1911 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, defining the jurisdiction of courts in Washington Territory."

PUBLIC LANDS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 2, which has been up heretofore.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Boutwell]

is absent.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have sent a page for him, and think he will be here in a moment.

Mr. INGALLS. He offered a substitute for the bill, and I know desires to be heard upon it. I hardly think the Senate should proceed with the bill in his absence.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think he will be in very soon.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. Clayton to the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS.

The amendment was to insert the following proviso at the end of the bill:

And provided, That the public lands affected by this act shall not be open to private entry until the same shall be offered at public sale after the passage of this act.

The amendment to the amendment was to strike out the amendment after the words "and provided," and insert in lieu thereof the

That the public lands affected by this act shall be offered at public sale as soon as practicable, from time to time and according to the provisions of existing laws, and shall not be subject to private entry until they are so offered.

Mr. INGALLS. Without any desire to delay action on this bill, there are so many Senators who have expressed an interest in it absent at this time from the Chamber and the whole subject is admitted to be one of such importance to a large portion of the country, that I submit to the Senator from Arkansas whether it would not be well to let this bill be made the special order for some day in order that notice may be given, so that all Senators interested in it may be present, and then let it be taken up for consideration.

Mr. CLAYTON. I did give notice the other day that I would call it up immediately after the centennial bill was disposed of, but at that time I was unable to do so on account of other business which was pressing before the Senate. I apprehend the Senator from Massachusetts, and other Senators are merely absent from the Chamber, but are in the building. If objection can be made to the present consideration of a bill because the seats of Senators are empty, we might as well stop all business at once. This bill has been before the Senate day after day and has been discussed somewhat at length. The amendment now pending I do not think will lead to any discussion from the fact that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] accepted the substitute I offered to his amendment before I offered it. I see the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is now here, and I hope the bill may be proceeded with and disposed of.

Mr. INGALLS. I doubt if there is a quorum present in the Chamber, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will count the Senate (A pause.) There is a quorum present, as shown by a count; and the question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment. Mr. OGLESBY. While I am opposed to the bill and shall vote against it when the question comes up on its passage, I believe there is no utility in the amendment to the amendment. I believe that it would only entail expense upon the Government through the Land Department. I believe that no good would come of these sales from an advertisement of the lands. Any offering of them in the market at public anction, according to the old custom, I believe would involve additional expense; and probably the expense would be more than any immediate profit to be derived from the sale of the land, should this

While I will oppose both amendments and think there is no utility in the amendments, I will do so because should the bill pass I think they would make the disposition of the lands more expensive. While I shall oppose the amendment, I shall also when the question comes up on the passage of the bill be compelled to vote against it, because I am opposed to the policy of it. I think the lands ought to be kept for actual settlers in those States, and ought not to be opened again to private or public sale. These are my views, which I have stated once before, and there is perhaps no occasion for pressing them again once before, and there is perhaps no occasion for pressing them again upon the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, it seems to me that nothing can be clearer than that if the bill is to pass at all it ought to pass with the amendment as proposed to be amended. I think the form of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas, if he was the originator of it, is better than that moved by the Senator from Vermont. But the bill presupposes that there are men who want to buy these lands, and who, if they were not withheld from sale, would buy them. If there are no such men, then it is not of the slightest importance that we pass the bill, because they will not buy the lands; but if there are men waiting to buy them at ten shillings, how can we possibly know that there are men who would not be glad to pay more possibly know that there are men who would not be glad to pay more than ten shillings for them? And if there are such men, of course they ought to have the opportunity of bidding against each other. It is the established usage of the Land Office when lands have been out of market for any time that they shall not be subject to private entry again until they have been offered at public sale, so that if they are worth more than the minimum price the Government may have some chance of getting what they are really worth, and the men who want them most may have an equal chance of purchasing. I certainly cannot see the slightest objection to the amendment to the amendment, and shall vote for it very cheerfully.

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not wish to detain the Senate with debate upon what is perhaps an immaterial matter. To rightly discuss the question of offering lands at public sale that have been once withdrawn from market or are about to be offered in the market would take up a great deal of time, and it would be a big field to go over. My recollection of the old policy has been that where lands have been offered in the market for the purpose of getting a higher price by competition than the minimum price of the Government, if the lands are worth having, if they are worth entering at all, experience shows that combinations are always made to prevent that competishows that combinations are always made to prevent that competi-tion, so that those desiring to get lands always get them, after the great expense of offering them at public sale by the Government, at the minimum price or at certainly a very small sum in excess of it. Now, these lands are represented by the Senators from these Southern States, and particularly from Arkansas, as being barren and substan-States, and particularly from Arkansas, as being barren and substantially worthless lands; and that the timber upon them, in many instances, is of no value. They have represented here, if they have represented anything, that a dollar and a quarter an acre for these lands is all that they are worth. They cannot be purchased at a less rate than that now; so that if this bill shall pass, and these lands shall again come upon the market for private entry, and the Government shall go to the expense of advertising them, of fixing times and places for public auction, and they shall be offered in different places here and there again at public sale before they may be put down for private entry, my opinion is that the expense of the experiment will exceed any profit to be derived from it in the way of increased price of the lands. Therefore I think, if the amendment becomes a law, it of the lands. Therefore I think, if the amendment becomes a law, it will add nothing whatever to the Treasury. I believe that the future will show, when the lands shall be practically put upon the market, that they will bring not an extra dollar to the Treasury. I think it would be better, if these lands are to be offered, that they should be offered at the minimum price to whoever will take them; but I do not want that thing done. I want the lands retained for actual settlers. I want them kept in these States. I would be glad if in all the United States there were no pre-emption law at all. It would be better to be rid of it. The time has gone by when there is any necessity for it. Let the public lands be retained in the custody of the Government for the purpose of occupation by actual settlers without compensation. I would be glad to see that principle, which has been applied to these five States, extended to all the States.

Therefore I would not be apt to favor a bill that would remove the present restrictions on the five States now covered by the bill proposing this new law; so that, while I see no utility in the amendment and probably shall not vote for it, I still hope that the bill itself will not

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I can understand the force of the sugges Mr. HAMLIN. I think I can understand the force of the suggestions made by the Senator from Illinois. I do not fail to appreciate them; but yet I think they are made upon the basis that all the lands offered in the market are to be agricultural lands or lands suitable for settlement. If that were so, I think I would agree with the Senator from Illinois, because it is desirable above all things that lands susceptible of cultivation shall be cultivated, and that by the strong arms of the men who till them they shall be made more valuable, and you thus add wealth to the body politic. I believe that is the reasoning upon which your homestead and pre-emption laws are based. I think they are sound rules, but my knowledge is—and I confess think they are sound rules, but my knowledge is—and I confess it is very limited, but it is such knowledge as I get from that ob-servation which I have been able to make and that information which I get through the reports relating to our public lands—that almost as a rule pine lands are not susceptible of cultivation; at least if they are not totally valueless they are so near it that they will never be occupied exclusively for agricultural purposes.

If you pass the bill in the form in which it is proposed, without protecting the revenues of the Government, you will give only to a man the right to pre-empt or enter for homestead purposes and to strip the land of that which makes it valuable, and, when he has so stripped it, to leave it never to be cultivated and never to have value added to it by cultivation, contrary to the very reasons upon which your pre-emption and homestead laws are founded. Now, it occurs to me that there is a way in which this thing might be met; and yet it is a matter about which I have not given enough reflection to know definitely. I think that there is a great deal in what the Senator definitely. I think that there is a great deal in what the Senator from Illinois has said in relation to combination to prevent a fair price being given at public auction; but it occurs to me that some provision in the bill might be made authorizing the lands to be sold not at public auction but by private sale, with a discretionary power in the Land Office to sell at a sum exceeding that which is now the maximum price of the Government—above the maximum price, $1.25.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Minimum.

Mr. HAMLIN. As I understand language, it would be the largest price we now get; but it would be the minimum price I great if they were to be sold above; you cannot sell below. We will call it the minimum price. I think it is minimum or maximum, precisely as you view it. It would be the minimum if Government could not sell above; it would be the maximum, I think, if they could not sell below. No matter; give to the Land Department the power to dispose of these lands to any individual for what the individual may give, whether it be $1.25 an acre or $4 an acre. I would not incorporate that principle in lands that are susceptible of cultivation, but, if these lands are truly valuable only for that which is upon them, and, that being taken off, they are little less than valueless, it seems to me the best interests of the Government admonish us that something of this kind should be done. I do not think that it can be reached by public auction, or I have some doubt whether it can; but most assuredly, if these lands are valuable and very valuable for the timber growing upon them, and valueless when that timber is taken away, we here, as the guardians of the public Treasury and of the public interest, ought not to allow them to go into the hands of speculators, whether they be small or great.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the objection made to requiring these lands to be offered at public sale is that it will entail some expense upon the Government and will realize no more for the lands. certain it will entail some expense upon the Government, but it is certain it will entail some expense apon the Government, but it is certain it will entail but very little expense. All the Government will have to do is to make proclamation that the lands within a given district will be offered at public sale at such a place, at such a time. That proclamation being duly published it is the notice, and that is all there is of it. Then each tract is put up by itself, and if anybody is willing to bid more than ten shillings an acre, the man who bids the most gets the land. The expense is very trifling.

The Senator from Illinois thinks that it is entirely improper to incur that expense, because combinations will be formed which will defeat the sale of the land at more than ten shilling per acre. His observation has certainly been very different from mine if it has led him to the conclusion that such combinations are usual or will be inevitably formed. I do not know but that they have been an incident of some public sale; but I have known Government lands sold as high as $75 an acre at public sale in the State of Wisconsin. I never knew a combination to prevent a fair sale. Lands were sold there a few years ago, not as high as that, lands belonging to an Indian reservation, but sold away above not only the minimum price of lands but the appraised value of the lands. When you put up a tract of land covered with pine timber especially, or loaded with mineral, or being extremely valuable, and offer it to the highest bidder with notice to all the world to come in and bid, it is a pretty difficult thing to effect a combination which will throw that particular tract of land into the hands of one man and at ten shillings an acre. There are too many greedy for it.

When the representatives from the States in which these lands lie When the representatives from the States in which these lands lie tell us that men are wanting to purchase them at ten shillings per acre, I do not see how we can safely conclude that there are not men who would be glad to pay more than ten shillings an acre for the best of the lands. I cannot see any objection to the amendment, therefore. I think the bill would be very objectionable without the amendment. There is some force in the objection which the Senator from Illinois urges to it if the amendment be adopted; but I think the Senator from Arkansas is entirely right when he says that either you ought to permit these lands to be sold or if you will withdraw them from to permit these lands to be sold, or if you will withdraw them from sale you ought to withdraw the public domain everywhere. The time has gone by, if it ever was proper, when we should make any distinc-tion in our legislation upon the subject of the public domain between the different States. Unhappily there was a time when we were absolutely driven to such discriminations in our legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I propose to amend the bill by adding as a new section what I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and required to cause appraisals to be made from time to time of the timber standing upon lands of the United States, and plans to be made of the same in lots containing not more than three hundred and twenty acres each; and any person may make entry of the stumpage upon any one of such lots, paying therefor a sum not less than the appraised value thereof, nor less than $1.25 per acre; and any person making such entry shall be allowed three years within which to remove the wood and timber from the land, but no person shall be permitted to make entry of a second lot until the wood and timber shall have been removed from any lot previously entered: Provided. That there shall be left standing upon each lot an average of one tree to the acre of every variety of wood and timber found growing thereon, the trees so reserved to be marked at the time the appraisal is made: And provided further, That all live-oak and red cedar shall be reserved, unless the President of the United States, by a specific order in particular cases, shall otherwise direct.

Mr. President if I can command the attention

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, if I can command the attention of the Senate to this amendment, it will be observed that it proceeds upon a different idea as to what is true public policy from the idea that controls the bill before the Senate, and perhaps from the general idea that pervades the action of the Government in regard to the timber lands of the country. The amendment which I propose looks to the preservation of the forests and not to their destruction, while the bill, substantially in harmony with the policy of the country, and certainly in harmony with the practice of the people, promotes the destruction of the forests.

It is perhaps too early in the life of the country to suggest that in two particulars we are moving in that clear path which is marked on every page of the history of the effete and extinct nations of the world: in the impoverishment of the land, and in the waste of the resources of nature for the support of animal life, which goes on to-day in every section of country except perhaps a few of the older States; and in the destruction of the forests of the country. We have placed, at the suggestion I suppose of the representatives from Minnesota and Maine and other timber-producing States, a duty upon the importation of the products of the forests of other countries, when as a matter of fact the products of the forests of other countries ought to be admitted free in order that if there is to be a waste of this important material in civilization, it should be at the expense of other people rather than at the ex-

I am of those who believe that nothing which has been granted by nature is more essential to the comfort, to the health, to the prosperity, and to the increase of the human race, except the preservation of the soil itself, than the preservation of the forests. This bill is a proposition to invite all the speculators and adventurers of the coun-To-day Mr. Marsh, in his Statistics and Observations upon the Relations of Man to Nature, shows that the southern portion of France, or that part bordering on the Mediterranean, is losing its population in consequence of the destruction of the forests. The same process that went on upon the southern shores of the Mediterranean, with the exception of Lower Egypt, has taken possession of the countries north of the Mediterranean wherever the forests have been destroyed. May not what has happened to other countries occur here? This is a fresh, new country; but our business is to preserve the forests for the benefit of the whole people, and to preserve the lands in the Government, so far as they can be preserved consistently with the growth of the coun-

This proposition is bad in the particular that it opens the possession and the title of these lands to whoever may have the ability to purchase them. They are to be sold for the value or something less than the value of the wood and the timber growing upon them; and the title to the soil is to be taken from the Government upon the suggestion that it is valueless, and transferred to those who may be able to obtain large tracts and hold them for their own purposes

The amendment which I submit to the Senate contemplates the sale of the timber standing upon the public lands, from time to time, as it may be wanted, and the preservation of the lands themselves that they may hereafter be open to pre-emption and homestead under the laws, instead of allowing them to be aggregated in the hands of rail-ways or capitalists, and held against the interest of the people of the country.

I have here a letter from a venerable gentleman, Mr. George B. Emerson, of Massachusetts, who for fifty years has made this subject his study. He has investigated the influence of forests upon the prosperty and population of other countries than our own; and I think it worth the attention of the Senate to listen to what he says upon the subject that is now before us. He says:

The owners of the forests have been, in every one of the northern States and in Canada, improvident in their management and wasteful to the last degree; and they continue so. At the rate at which they have gone in cutting down their forests for the last ten or twelve years, the forests will be completely stripped of valuable timber within that space of time.

The largest demand on the forests, till within a few years, has been for timber for ship-building, in this and several foreign countries. This demand will not be likely to diminish, while that for railroads and bridges will probably increase. For the building of houses of all kinds, public and private, for barns and fences and bridges, and numberless other uses, large quantities of wood will always be necessary; to say nothing of the many manufactories of wooden materials. Forests of tall trees, especially on the tops and sides of hills, give protection from the violence of winds, and thus do much to secure the comfort of the inhabitants. They are essential to the continuance of springs and streams and to the gradual but constant and perennial supply of rivers.

He further says:

He further says:

The leaves of trees and shrubs of all kinds drink in from the atmosphere all deleterious and unwholesome gases, the poisonous parts of which they convert into their own substance, and pour back into the atmosphere the pure oxygen essential to animal life.

Again he says:

I have, from the constant consideration of the whole subject, come to the conclusion that the uses of the forests, present and future, as furnishing timber of all kinds for fuel, as materials for building, for railroads, for ships, for bridges, for numerous manufactures, as protection against furious winds and malarious discases, and the preservation of springs and streams, and the comfort and beauty of every town, are such that there is no room to doubt that everywhere, in every State and every town, at least one-third part of the surface should be kept in forest or restored to it.

I have neglected to say anything about the action and preservation of given but I have neglected to it.

I have neglected to say anything about the action and preservation of rivers, but I must add something upon the subject.

The sides of hills and mountains have so frequently become agents of destruction and ruin, from being stripped of their trees, converted from precious reservoirs of moisture, for the preservation of springs and streams, into sources of destruction to the plains below, that the forests on mountain-sides and hill-sides should be considered sacred.

We see how the Ohio has been changed, from the beautiful and constantly useful stream it was when first known, into a river of floods in spring and shallows in summer, and we should take care that our own Kennebec, and Penobscot, and Saco, and Connecticut shall not be quite ruined in the same manner. We must look forward and preserve from the same fate the affluents of the Mississippi and the Missouri and those noble streams themselves.

Now, sir, I am so convinced of the truth of these suggestions, of the wisdom of these observations, the result, not of the experience and investigation of a single man, even through a long life, but the result of the sad experience of nations that have risen and flourished and disappeared chiefly through the two causes which I have mentioned—the impoverishment of the soil and the destruction of the forests—that for one I wish, here in the Senate, to enter my protest against a measure which is not a measure of revenue or of loss of revenue to the Treasury to-day. The question of the public lands, whether they are sold or held as a means of revenue, is of no consequence to the country compared with the continuance of a system of waste, which is not merely a system of waste to the Treasury and to the people of is not merely a system of waste to the Treasury and to the people of the country to-day, but is a system of robbery and plunder of generations yet to come; and for one I enter my protest against this policy of urging and encouraging the waste of the timber lands upon any plea that it is necessary for the support of the Treasury or to increase the business, the population, or the present resources of any State or district of the Union.

Mr. HOWE

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am, as well as my judgment informs me, ready to labor by the side of the Senator from Massachusetts for the welfare of the Government to-day and of the generation now existing; but, when he calls upon us to embark very heavily in the protection of generations yet unborn, I am very much inclined to reply to that that they have never done anything for me, and I do not want to sacrifice too much.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That is on the ground that our relations are personal, and do not concern human nature.

Mr. HOWE. Most of my relations are personal. I think the Senator's amendment, however, is quite at war with his theory. He complains that the timber of the country is being consumed too rapidly. A good deal might be said upon that point. I really do not think we have any conclusive testimony that such is the fact. Nobody consumes timber unless he thinks he needs it or needs the space it occupies; and if a full-grown man with unimpaired intellect really thinks he needs to cut down and cut up a pine tree, and is willing to pay a fair price for it to the owner of the tree, why should he not have it? Are we not legislating upon rather a dangerous domain when we undertake to say he shall not have it? Or, if he does not want to use the tree, but does want to cultivate the spot on which it stands, why should we not permit it, he paying for the tree and the Mr. HOWE. Most of my relations are personal. I think the Senstands, why should we not permit it, he paying for the tree and the soil? Why should we not permit him to do it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends on whether the public good will permit it.

Mr. HOWE. That would not depend on whether the public good will permit it. You put your price upon the tree and the land, and he pays the price. If you have marked your goods too low, the remedy is very plain; mark them up; but the remedy proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts does not do that.

Senator from Massachusetts does not do that.

The public good my friend suggests may require us to preserve the forests. Perhaps it is so; but it would be difficult I think to make that plain. It may be the duty of this generation not merely to carry on a great war and fight great battles and spend thousands of millions to hand down liberty to our posterity, but it may be our duty to tax ourselves in order to hand down pine timber to our posterity. I do not propose to stop just now to argue that question. I think, however, that our posterity will not be troubled to find timber for a good while to come. But I say the amendment proposed by the for a good while to come. But I say the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is not calculated to preserve timber. The great discouragement in the way of purchasing your lands at present is that a man has not merely to pay for the land the price which your laws fix upon the land with the timber on it, but he has to become the owner of the land and thus pay taxes on it. The property becomes taxable. It is somewhat onerous for him to carry it. The Senator's amendment properse to relieve him to carry it. The Senator's amendment proposes to relieve him of that, the greatest embarrassment in the way of carrying large bodies of land.

It proposes in the first place to have not the land appraised, but the timber on it appraised. The first prediction I have to make is that you would never see ten shillings an acre, nor fifty cents an acre for your timber. You never could correct an appraisal, and the purchaser or the man seeking to purchase would be very sure to have an appraisal which was not in the interest of the Government, but was in his own interest. Then when he has bought the timber on your land, which is all he cares about, for from twenty-five to seventy-five cents an acre, he goes on to cut it off. Then the land is left in the hands of the Government never to be sold. The man who purchased the timber has no further interest in it; he has no burden resting upon him; there are no taxes paid to the local government, and never will be, for your pine lands will not be purchased for a century to come after the timber is taken off.

There is a provision in the section, to be sure, which says that when a man has bought one tract he shall not buy another until he has taken the timber off that. If the Senator supposes that practically that is a limitation or will operate as a limitation on a man's purchasing he is entirely mistaken, for what is not purchased in his own name, if he wants it, will be purchased in the name of his friend. I have no manner of doubt that this amendment will do two things: It will hasten the destruction of timber and it will diminish the revenues of the Government.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I like very well the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts on this subject; but unfortunately it does not seem to me to apply at all to his amendment. I too would favor any provision looking toward the preservation of the timber of the country, and I think that the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands will tend to do that much more effectually than the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from

At present these timber lands, spread all over the country, are owned by the Government, and it is nobody's interest to take care of them. If, as is feared by the Senator from Massachusetts and others who oppose this bill, large quantities of these lands shall be entered by private parties, it will be to the interest of those parties to protect these timber lands from fire and other waste. Now it is nobody's interest to protect them. Therefore, I say that they are much more likely to be wasted now than they would be if entered.

Again, the Senator from Massachusetts proposes in his speech, though I think not in his bill, to prevent the use to some extent, or to check, or in some way limit the use of these timber lands for manufacturing purposes. I think his bill does not do it. I think that no man is going to enter the stumpage provided for in the Senator's bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of presenting the report of a conference committee?

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, sir.

GEORGE WILLARD,
Maragers on the part of the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will in a few words state to the Senate the effect of this report. As the report fixes the matter, the bill provides that there shall be no further issue of 3.65 bonds. In the next place it provides that the commissioners shall make no more expenditures for improvements or repairs of any kind for which 3.65 bonds were provided to be issued. In the third place, the functions of the board of audit shall be suspended altogether, except that they shall be authorized to issue certificates for the claims already audited and for other claims not audited where labor has been performed and materials furnished; but except as to those their functions are en-materials furnished; but except as to those their functions are entirely suspended.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the chairman have any objection to letting this report be printed?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If that is desirable, after I have made a statement, I will not object, because I think the Senate has a right to have that done if it chooses.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think we ought to have it printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is provided, however, that these certificates shall in no case exceed the fifteen million-dollar limitation in the bill, including the certificates already carried into bonds. This also includes the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, that there shall be no increase of the public debt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You mean no increase of the debt of the District.
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That amendment is left in as it was, whatever may have been its language.
Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to inquire of the Senator whether he has any objection to this report going over until to-morrow and in the mean time being printed in such wise that we can understand what we are to vote upon. I am not aware that the amendments made in the Senate have ever been printed at all. I understand that the other House simply disagreed to our amendment. If the bill were printed as it passed the Senate and the report of the committee were also printed and laid on our tables to-morrow morning, we should then know exactly how to vote. There is a way of doing that thing; I have known it done repeatedly; and I hope that it may be done in this case. I have no objection to interpose merely for delay, but I want to understand this matter before I vote.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I shall certainly acquiesce, so far as I am concerned, in any desire of the Senate on this subject. I have no Mr. THURMAN. I think that will be better.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator will perceive that we ought to act with proper dispatch.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not interposing for delay.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it not a matter of right that the report shall

Mr. THURMAN. I move that it be printed in the manner I have indicated—the Chief Clerk will understand it—so that the bill as it passed the Senate and the report of the committee shall be printed in such wise as to show us precisely what we are to vote on when we act upon this report.

Mr. SARGENT. On that motion I wish to be heard for but a moment. I was a member of this conference committee and signed the report with some reluctance. My reluctance arose from two circumstances. In the first place, as the House and Senate both agreed, the further issuance of these bonds is absolutely prohibited. That feature is retained in the report. The limit which the Senate fixed for the $15,000,000 of certificates also is retained; and there is a margin between the sum of $14,000,000 and $15,000,000 entirely unprovided for by this bill. That is to say, the parties cannot get the bonds for their certificates, and there is no provision for paying them in money. I thought it was only just to honest creditors that there should be some means provided by which they could get the money due them or receive the bonds.

Another provision I thought ought to be inserted in the report, and that was that, after Congress had determined that the proper amount issued up to this time was a little over $14,000,000 of bonds, the interest thereon should be paid regularly at the Treasury, as provided by the legislation of June 1874, and that the amount should be assessed upon the District, or half the amount, if that was the proper sum, to be paid out of the revenue derived from taxation in the District and paid into the Treasury, so that these bonds might not be hawked about and liable to have a black eye by debates in Congress hereafter arising from any motives.

As both these things are not provided for in this legislation, I had considerable hesitancy in signing the report at all; but as there was at any rate a provision to redeem the pledge of the United States in the legislation of 1874 for the balance of this fiscal year, and as the session of Congress would probably run into June or July, and there would be a possibility of more comprehensive legislation to cover the subject, I finally concluded to sign the report and agree with my colleagues. I have no objection to its going over and being printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being raised to present consideration, the report will go over and be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BOUTWELL

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. W.NDOM. I was about to say that it seemed to me that the man who buys a tract of land and owns the fee simple is not more likely to waste the valuable growth of timber upon it than he who merely buys the right to cut that timber from it and is limited to three years to get it off.

It seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts if designed to hasten the destruction of timber could not be better drawn. The man who buys the land has every inducement to keep it. If the timber on it is going to become more valuable in the future he will take out as much as he needs for present use and carefully preserve the thrifty young timber for the future. But, under fully preserve the thrifty young timber for the future. But, under the amendment now under consideration, the man who buys three hundred and twenty acres of stumpage has no interest in it after his three years are up. He is compelled to sweep it off within that lim-ited time, and there is no provision whatever whereby the young and growing timber shall be preserved, and no one has any interest in preserving it. Therefore I think that the whole tendency of this amendment is to destroy rather than to save, except in this, that the Senator from Massachusetts has provided that there shall be three hundred and twenty trees selected and left standing upon every three hundred and twenty acres of land. As the amendment was originally printed—I presume it was a mistake, however—he had provided that there should be one tree on each tract of three hundred and twenty acres. That would be tolerably sparse; but the amendment as now read by the Secretary has considerably enlarged that, and we are to have three hundred and twenty trees to the tract, or six hundred and forty trees on every mile square, to produce this wonderful effect, by way of increasing the moisture, and precipitating more rain-fall, and all that sort of thing, in this country!

I have an objection to this amendment on another ground, its vast expense. There are about forty millions of acres, I am told, in these five States. The amendment provides:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and required to cause appraisals to be made from time to time of the timber standing upon lands of the United States—

It covers all the lands, as well in other States as in these fiveand plans to be made of the same in lots containing not more than three hundred and twenty acres each.

This requires a resurvey, a remapping of all the timber lands in the country, and not only must these appraisers resurvey them to know where the lines are of each three hundred and twenty acre tract, but they must go over that three-hundred-and-twenty-acre tract and select and mark three hundred and twenty trees on each tract, because the amendment provides that the persons buying the stumpage shall leave upon the land one tree to every acre on the tract, and the trees so reserved are to be marked at the time the appraisal is made. Now I fancy this is a pretty expensive contract that somebody is to take. Imagine these appraisers going over the swamps of Florida, of Alabama, and of Mississippi, and even in the northern part of my own State and of yours, Mr. President, surveying these lands off into threehundred-and-twenty-acre tracts, then wading through the swamps to mark three hundred and twenty trees on each tract. Why, sir, we shall have as many appraisers as there were locusts in Egypt if this work is ever done.

The amendment provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall be required to do it. It is true it must be done "from time to time," but I apprehend under this amendment it must be done when the demand is made for the purchase of these timber lands; and when a demand is made for any particular locality, I apprehend that a fair construction of the bill would require that the Government should get ready to show where the lines of these tracts are, and to indicate these favored three hundred and twenty trees that shall be left standing on the three hundred and twenty acres.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is not alone three hundred and twenty trees, but three hundred and twenty of each species, of each kind, as I

Mr. WINDOM. "There shall be left standing upon each lot an average of one tree to the acre of every variety of wood and timber found growing thereon."

Mr. CLAYTON. "One tree of every variety."

Mr. WINDOM. I think, Mr. President, that I was altogether too limited in my construction and that the Senator from Arkansas is right that this commission must go over and they must not only ascertain the lines of each three-hundred-and-twenty-acre tract, but they must ascertain every kind of tree and timber that grows on that three-hundred-and-twenty-acre tract.

Mr. CLAYTON. And they must locate every acre also.
Mr. WINDOM. I think not. I cannot go so far as that with my friend. They must ascertain every kind of tree that grows on it, and then they must find, if they can, three hundred and twenty trees of each and every one of those kinds. My friend says they must locate them on each acre. I do not think so. I do not want to give any unfair construction to this amendment. It says:

That there shall be left standing upon each lot an average of one tree to the acre.

Upon each three hundred and twenty acre lot; but it does not follow that every one of those three hundred and twenty trees of every conceivable kind growing in that country shall be in each particular acre; but it must be on the three hundred and twenty acres. I do not believe the Senate is ready to enter upon that kind of survey just at present over all the vast expanse of timber lands of this country; and the amendment applies not only to the lands in the five States covered by the original bill, but to all timber lands in the United States, as I understand it.

Then, again, the argument the Senator from Massachusetts based upon the letter of his friend-and I agree most fully with the theories there advanced-is that this timber is to be left standing for the sake of its effects upon climate, the increase of rain-fall, the increased amount of moisture which is to be produced, &c. In some sections of the country it is very important to increase the rain-fall and the moisture; but I appeal to my friend from Florida if they have not got nearly moisture enough down in the everglades of his State. Is it very important that three hundred and twenty trees be left standing on every three hundred and twenty acre tract in Florida in order that those swamps and bayous may be kept full? I think it would be considered a benefit to Florida if we could reduce the moisture there somewhat. It is so in other States. My objection, therefore, to this amendment is that as it applies to all the States of the Union it should be more carefully considered, and that we should not enact a general law applicable to the timber lands of the United States in an amendment called up without any consideration, without discussion before a committee, and without the investigation, too, that such a measure should receive before it is passed.

Now, Mr. President, I do not conceive of the serious difficulties which have been mentioned to the bill reported from the committee. which have been mentioned to the bill reported from the committee. It simply places these five States upon an equality with all the other States. If the timber lands of the country are being wasted, they are being wasted as much in other States as there; and when you make a law on this subject, I would make it to apply to each and every State alike. In the first place, I want to wipe out this obnoxious distinction between the lands in these five States and in others; and then I am ready to meet with my friend from Massachusetts and frame a general law, if he pleases, to protect the timber lands of the country. I want in the mean time, however, to stop what the Commissioner of the General Land Office says is a great waste to the Govcountry. I want in the mean time, however, to stop what the Commissioner of the General Land Office says is a great waste to the Government. Under the existing law nobody can take these lands except under the homestead act; and this act is used, he says, as a cover for fraud. Parties will go and take possession of the land under the homestead act, steal the timber from it, and then desert it. There is no protection to the timber as the law now stands. I do not see if my friend from Massachusetts can succeed in defeating this bill that he protects the timber at all, for we are told by the officer to whom we are to look for information on this subject that the timber is being wasted, it is being stolen. The law is at present offering a reward to perjury in all these States, because the man who goes upon the lands swears that he takes them as a homestead for his own use and cultivation, meaning simply to take them for the purpose of robbing them of timber and then deserting them, thus swearing to that which is not true.

Mr. INGALLS. Is he not required to make the same oath under the pre-emption law?

Mr. WINDOM. Not the same oath precisely; but that he takes them for cultivation.

Mr. INGALLS. It is substantially the same.
Mr. WINDOM. We propose by this act that he shall have an opportunity to go into the land offices in these States and honestly pay his money for the land without swearing to a falsehood in order to coverup his efforts to steal from the Government.

I think for all these reasons, and many others, this bill ought to pass and certainly this amendment ought not to prevail until it is much more fully considered and investigated than it has been yet.

Mr. President, I seem to have made two converts by the speech, if so it may be called, which I had the honor to address to the Senate. It was rather unexpected to me that I should do so, and especially unexpected, and gratifying as well, that those converts should come from States where, reasoning beforehand, I should have least expected them; from States in which the general policy has been to destroy the timber by many reasonable methods, and by many extraordinary processes. They object to the amendment. They favor the principle, but they dislike the way. The State from which my distinguished friend on my left [Mr. Hamlin] comes has given name to a law that has been known over the country, and an attempt has been made to enforce it in some places. It is said that there were persons who favored the law, but were opposed to the execution of I congratulate myself that my distinguished friend from Minnesota on my right [Mr. Windom] and my no less distinguished friend from Wisconsin on my left [Mr. Howe] have accepted the principle that the forests of the country ought to be preserved. I do not know exactly on what ground the Senator from Wisconsin accepted that idea, for he said he was under no obligations to posterity, and had no desire to do anything for them; but inasmuch as they have accepted the proposition that the forests of the country ought to be preserved either for the present or for future generations, I trust they will agree in some method by which the doctrines presented in my observations may be made a part of the public policy of the country.

The Senator from Minnesota misapprehended my amendment in several particulars. He made progress by the help of other Senators as he went on; and if that spirit of progress shall continue to animate him in time to come I have no doubt he will approach this submate him in time to come I have no doubt he will approach this subject at some future session with not only the inclination but with the capacity to devise and present a plan by which that which is so near to his heart, the preservation of the forests upon the public lands, shall be fully and fairly accomplished. At first he thought that there was to be but one tree upon a whole tract of three hundred and twenty acres preserved; and he thought as well that it was for the purpose of furnishing moisture to the soil and renovation to the atmosphere. He then discovered that three hundred and twenty trees were to be preserved. He thought that a slight provision for the accomplishment of so great a result. But again, with the help of the honorable Senator from Arkansas, he discovered that there were to be three hundred and twenty trees of each variety of wood and timber growing upon the lot to be preserved; and, while he thought that suffi-cient for the moist lands of Florida that sink and rise with the slight ebb and flow of the tide in the Saint John's River, he could not comprehend that it would be sufficient for the somewhat arid plains of the West and the Northwest, as you approach the regions of the great desert between this and the Pacific Ocean. The thought was not in my mind that either one tree to a tract of three hundred and twenty acres or three hundred and twenty trees to a tract of three hundred and twenty acres or one tree of every variety to every acre of each lot of three hundred and twenty acres would be sufficient to accomplish the result which he desires. No, sir; it was, inasmuch as these lands under this amendment were to be held as public property, subject under this amendment were to be held as public property, subject only to the right of the settlers under the pre-emption or homestead laws to occupy them from time to time, as the demand for settlement and for homes should increase, that these trees left should furnish a shade and protection to the growing vegetation, or to the vegetation that might seek to grow, and especially furnish seeds for the reproduction of other forests; for I am not indifferent to future generations. The Senator from Wisconsin said that he is under no obligations to them. Has he not proved the benefits he has received from the fathers of the Republic and from civilization and civilized men through all times, from the earliest period when the light of civilization dawned times, from the earliest period when the light of civilization dawned in the human mind till now? Has he not become responsible to future generations for the transmission, not only of the principles of liberty and of good government, but for those natural privileges and advantages God has given, not to us of this generation, but to mankind of every generation?

I do not expect this measure to be carried to-day; but I for one ask the Senate, if not by a majority, by an expression of opinion however small or however large, to make a record that posterity may see that there were some who were willing to forego the temporary advantages of gathering a small amount of revenue into the public Treasury that they might leave for future generations the means of subsistence in a country where not only the principles of liberty but all natural advantages continuing from generation to generation should enable the people to have homes in which the light of liberty would be a blessing and not a rebuke.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am afraid I compromised myself in the eyes of posterity—evidently I did in the eyes of my friend from Massachusetts—by my seeming carelessness as to those who are to come after us. I did not mean to do myself injustice, I am sure; and I did not really mean to do injustice to succeeding generations. I did not mean to say, and do not think I did say, that I was under no obligations to succeeding generations. I believe I did say that I did not want to tax myself too heavily for those who are to come after us; and suggested as one reason why I did not that those who are to come after us had not done anything for us. That, I believe, was about the extent to which I went. But I believe I will say upon this point that I do think the work of affording timber for succeeding generations, if not Utopian, is not exactly practical. I do not think as a rule the timber will be consumed unless the person wants it; and if the person wants the shelter of the timber or the use of the soil on which the timber stands, I do not think you should strip the person of these necessities because we think somebody is coming hereafter who may want them more, any more than I think my friend should go to bed to-night with half a dinner because he may think that in some generation to succeed a descendant of his would not be able to get food at all. Suppose you could level every tree now standable to get food at all. Suppose you could rever every tree now standing with the dust, next year; before a very remote posterity comes along you could reproduce forests, and the work of maintaining and perpetuating standing trees is a little arduous. Decay overtakes them. They will not live beyond a certain age, or perhaps an uncer-

Children are growing up at their side.

Mr. HOWE. Well, I am quite in favor of nursing the children; but as for the old people, the trunks come down as fast as they are wanted. There are other ways in which we can serve posterity, and I think serve posterity better.

My friend from Massachusetts was good enough to take notice that both the Senator from Minnesota and myself have shown a disposition to have the forests protected, so far as they could be; and, as he ought to have done, he took courage from that fact. think, no more than justice, certainly no more than justice to myself. I was always remarkable for my tenderness for forests. When I was young I never could bear to cut them down. I did not like to cut them up, and I did not quite relish carrying them in after they were cut up. [Laughter.] I think he can rely on my good will to forests.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to say just one word on that branch of the question which relates to the destruction of timber. I take it for question which relates to the destruction of timber. I take it for granted that men do not go into a forest and cut down trees for the mere fun of hearing them fall. They have an object when they cut down trees, and probably it is either one of two: They either desire to cut down the timber in order to cultivate the land which it stands upon or they cut down the timber for some useful purpose. Of course, if these lands were agricultural lands there would be danger of the destruction of the timber upon them in order to open them up for cultivation; but it is assumed that these lands are not agricultural cultivation; but it is assumed that these lands are likely alone the lands. Hence the only reason for destroying the timber upon them must be to subserve some useful purpose. That being the case, if must be to subserve some useful purpose. That being the case, if this timber is valuable now or is likely to be in the future, if men purchase these lands they will be interested in protecting the timber. Any one who knows anything about these timbered countries knows that fire is the principal destroying cause. Nearly every autumn they are swept over by fire that destroys all the undergrowth, and very frequently the large trees themselves. Men who would own these small tracts could afford to plow furrows around the tracts, as is often done, and prevent such fires from extending over the lands. I repeat, then, it is not likely that they will destroy the timber upon these lands unless it is for the purpose of clearing the land for agriculture or for some useful purpose. In this case it must be for some useful purpose, because the lands are unfit for agriculture.

The object of this bill is not at all to perpetuate or to increase the destruction of timber. It is to give the people of these five States an opportunity to use a limited portion of that timber for useful purposes, and to take care of the rest of it; that is all. It seems to me the proposition is so clear, so plain, that all this talk about the destruction of timber if this bill should pass ought to go for nothing.

Mr. WINDOM. As the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has deserted his amendment, I do not care to say much more about it. He stated to us in his last speech that he did not expect it to pass the Senate. I did not believe he expected that when he offered it; but, as he has notified the Senate that he does not expect it, I agree with him that nobody else expects it to pass.

I want to make a remark simply on another point. The Senator refers to me as being from a State where timber has been destroyed by various means, suggesting that some of them were not quite proper. I want to say to the honorable Senator that he has news on that subject which I have never received. I know of no destruction of timber by the people of my State. In fact they value it very.

highly. It is guarded as well as it can be. The destruction of timber in Minnesota arises from fires spreading over the Government lands, and not from wanton waste by the people. I will add this by way of suggestion to the Senator: When he and I meet to devise the best mode of increasing the growth of timber in this country, if he will agree to appropriate one-half the money it would take to set these thousands of appraisers and markers to work over the swamps of the country, to plant out timber in the prairie portions of the country, he would do vastly more benefit than by the expensive arrangement which he now proposes. In my State we have planted out within the last year millions of trees on the open prairie. Societies have been formed in many counties, and a parent society in the State capital, for the express purpose of encouraging their cultivation, and the people of that State have taken great interest in the subject. Now, if instead of marking all the hackberry and dogwood bushes and every conceivable kind of vine and gum and beech and everything else down in Florida and Alabama, in order that you may have three hundred and twenty of each kind on a tract, he would appropriate one-half of that money to set out timber, growing timber, on the treeless plains, we should have some benefit from it. thousands of appraisers and markers to work over the swamps of the

we should have some benefit from it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Boutwell.]

he amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to strike out the second section. As the bill was originally reported the second section provided that it should go into effect ninety days after its passage. The idea as it was orig-inally reported was to give time for the public to be advertised of this measure; but since the amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont has been put upon it, which requires advertisement through the papers and a resurvey of these lands, I think that the

Mr. WEST. The remarks of the Senator from Arkansas would seem to imply that this bill was not operative upon any other than timber lands. The amendments that have been put upon it relate entirely to timber lands. In my State, however, there are other lands that this bill will apply to, and I certainly cannot consent to the proposition to strike out the ninety-days' notice.

Mr. CLAYTON. That does not affect it at all.

You propose it shall Mr. WEST. · I cannot see why it does not. take effect immediately.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is no mention of timber lands in this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is no mention of timber fands in this bill.
Mr. WEST. Are not the lands to be appraised?
Mr. CLAYTON. They are to be offered for sale; not appraised.
Mr. WEST. What has become of the amendment which provided for their appraisal?
Mr. CLAYTON. That has just been voted down.
Mr. WEST. All right. Then I have no objection to it. I have been out of the Chamber and did not know what was done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, to strike out the second section:

That this act shall take effect at the expiration of ninety days from the date of its

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. It is admitted by the advocates of this bill that it is not devised or intended in the interest of agriculture. The Senators from all the States which are affected by its provisions, I think, have said openly that its object was to throw open the timber lands of that portion of the country to acquisition. There appears to be a remarkable discrepancy or inconsistency between the arguments that have been used and the statements that have been made by those who favor the passage of the bill. If we could believe the arguments of the Senator from Arkansas, the Senate would be led to suppose that there was an immense demand for the immediate repeal of the provisions of what is known as the southern homestead act; that thousands of men who were unable to obtain title to land in the State of Arkansas, men who were unable to obtain title to land in the State of Arkansas, or in the State of Florida, or Mississippi, were at the doors of the local land offices and are at the doors of the Senate imploring some immediate action for the purpose of removing this restriction and allowing them to pre-empt the lands in those States.

The Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Norwood,] in some remarks that he made the other day, stated to the Senate that thousands of acres of heavily timbered land could be obtained along the seaboard, in a section penetrated by four lines of railroad, for from ten to twenty cents an acre. The Senator from Arkansas informed as the through cents an acre. The Senator from Arkansas informed us that through his State, along the lines of intersecting railroads, enormous tracts of this very kind of lands were accessible and could be obtained by persons desiring to secure a title to them, and that they remained unsold for the want of purchasers. Then, upon the other hand, I find in the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the current year the following statement:

Since the close of the war of the rebellion attention has been attracted to these timbered tracts, and in many localities they have been subject to wholesale depredation, their product forming the basis of a large commerce, employing extensive mills for manufacture, ships for transportation, and being distributed generally along the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator inform the Senate whether the lands referred to there are exclusively in these five States?

Mr. INGALLS. I read from the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the year 1875 in relation to the act of June 21, 1863, which he says is an act for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlements in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida.

This restriction is continued in force, and is now found embodied in section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. If it does not interrupt the Senator from Kansas, I should like to make one single inquiry for my own information. should like to ask the question whether, if this bill passes, the lands in the five States named will stand on precisely the same footing with the lands in the other States?

Mr. INGALLS. That is my understanding.

Mr. THURMAN. There will be no difference then in the land system throughout the Republic †

Mr. BOGY. None at all.
Mr. INGALLS: It will become symmetrical and harmonions.
Mr. THURMAN. I only wanted to know if that was the fact.
Mr. BOGY. That is the object, and the only object.

Mr. INGALLS. So then, sir, taking the statement of the Senators from the States interested, in connection with the statement made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, I think that the Senate is justified in assuming that the only object for the passage of this bill is to promote what is commonly known as speculation and speculation in timber. I use the term "speculation" now in no offensive sense, for speculation in its way is just as honest and just as honorable and just as legitimate as agriculture or any other human pursuit or any other method of industry. But I say, sir, that I assume that the object that the promoters of this bill have in urging its passage is to enable men to speculate in the timber on the public domain. I think I am correct in assuming that there cannot be any doubt about it.

The land is not useful for agriculture; it is not desired for the farming interests of the country. The Senators tell us in one breath that it is useless, valueless for any purpose whatever, thousands of acres being obtainable for from ten to twenty cents an acre, and at the same time we learn from the authorized officer of the Government having the matter under control and in charge that the products of these very lands are the subject of an enormous illicit annual commerce, requiring, as he says, very large amounts of machinery for the manufacture of lumber and the employment of ships for its transportation. Well, sir, if this is the case, certainly it seems to me, as I have previously affirmed, that, the object of the pre-emption and homestead laws being for the interest of agriculture alone, we ought not to be called upon to remove a restriction from the disposal of these lands when it is admitted that they have a commercial value that is very greatly in advance of that which is placed upon lands exclusively agricultural. But, sir, admitting for the purposes of the arguments that these gentlemen advance that it is legitimate and proper to ask the Government to enable men who are desirous of speculating in timber to obtain by selection from among the public lands of the United States obtain by selection from among the public lands of the United States enormous tracts, covered it may be with the most valuable timber for the manufacture of lumber for domestic purposes, or it may be for ship-building—admitting that it is right and proper that they should have the opportunity of selecting these lands at a dollar and a quarter an acre, how is that interest, how are the purposes that these Scantors have in view to be promoted by removing the restrictions that now are placed on these lands and opening them to the operations of the pre-emption law? Every Scantor who is at all familiar with the methods for the disposition of the public domain knows that for pre-emption purposes a residence, a settlement, an Amminar with the methods for the disposition of the public domain knows that for pre-emption purposes a residence, a settlement, an improvement is just as necessary as for homestead purposes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. This bill does not require these lands to be subjected to the pre-emption law. It requires them to be offered for sale as soon as practicable. After that they are subject to private entry,

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] said in the course of his argument the other day that the object was to open these lands to pre-emption so that persons could obtain legitimately a title to them, and therefore by that process remove the temptation to depredation, to plunder, to trespass, and to robbery of the public domain

Mr. CLAYTON. The bill has been amended since then.
Mr. INGALLS. I understand it has been amended; but if the preemption law is what the Senators rely upon it is entirely impracticable, it is entirely useless and valueless for their purposes, because it does as I say require settlement, residence, improvement, and occupation.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator yield for a moment, as he has quoted me !

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. What I said was that it would leave these lands subject to the existing land laws; that they might be taken then either by homesteads or pre-emptions or private entry; that as they had once been offered they were subject to private entry. It is not likely that any one is going to settle on these lands, improve them, and then pay a dollar and a quarter an acre for them, when he can go into the Land Office and buy them for a dollar and a quarter an acre without this improvement. Consequently the pre-emption act would not apply to them; at least it would not be used. It might apply, but it would not be used; men would buy them at private outry. Mr. INGALLS. At what price?

Mr. WINDOM. A dollar and a quarter an acre as it stands now.
Mr. INGALLS. That is just what I have been saying; and on the very theory on which the repeal of this section is asked men ought very theory on which the repeal of this section is asked men ought not to have them at a dollar and a quarter an acre. There is no justice in allowing these men to go onto the timbered portion of the public domain and select at their pleasure hundreds or thousands of acres, it may be, of the most valuable and heavily timbered land for commercial purposes and pay for it at the rate of a dollar and a quarter an acre. Aside from the economical questions the Senator from Massachusetts has raised in regard to the effect upon the country of its denudation of timber, there comes in the question of actual instice and right to the Treasury and to the people. justice and right to the Treasury and to the people.

Mr. CLAYTON. You can compete.
Mr. INGALLS. I understand that, but I am not in the timberspeculating business.

Mr. CLAYTON. Any person can compete. That is what I mean.

Mr. INGALLS. That is true; but the Senator understands very well in regard to the disposition of public lands by public or private well in regard to the disposition of public lands by public of pivate sale that whenever a certain number of men desire to secure a title to a portion of the public domain they always combine, and it is exceedingly unsafe for any interloper or any man not in the combination, or in "the ring," as it might be called, to compete with them or to attempt to obtain title. It is one of the most dangerous experiments that any man can make to intrude upon a body or association of squatters upon the public domain or claimants upon the public domain, and attempt to compete with them for the purpose of enforcing what may be his natural rights, as well as theirs, to obtain a given or particular portion of the land. They select their tracts; they associate themselves together for the purpose of obtaining the title; and, if any man attempts to compete with them, he is quietly warned that it will be dangerous for him; that he had better withdraw; and the result is that it is in every instance obtained at the lowest price at which the Government offers it for sale.

Now, sir, a word with regard to the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Thurman.] He asked whether the removal of this restriction, or the passage of this bill, would not leave the laws applicable to the public domain uniform in their operation throughout the entire country. It is very true that it would; but the conditions and circumstances of the public domain in different portions of this country. try are not the same. So far as I am concerned, coming from one of the distinctively great public-land States of this Union, instead of removing this restriction from the five States named in the bill, I should prefer to extend its provisions over every other State in this country. If I had my way I would do it before the Senate adjourns this afternoon. But that, of course, is not feasible.

Considering the great importance of this whole question, considering the admissions of the Senators themselves who are urging the passage of this bill, considering the fact that the depredations upon this portion of the public domain are so great as to form the basis of one branch of our commerce, and believing that there has not been sufficient time for the discussion of measures that ought to be elaborated before we can consider fully this subject, I move that this bill and the amendments be committed to the Committee on Public Lands with instructions to report a general bill for the sale and disposition of the timber lands of the United States.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope that will not be done. It is well known that such a measure was before Congress at the last session. I have no objection in the world to joining my friend from Kansas if he thinks in his own State the public lands ought to be excluded from the pro-visions of the pre-emption law and other laws. The conditions are not the same; and we have so averred all the time. If there are any arguments at all to apply to public lands these restrictions, they would extend to such States as his. The trouble is that, whenever we bring up this simple, plain proposition to put these five States on an equality with the other States of this Union, we are met with a proposition to bring in some theoretical question; some question that may have merit in it or may not; some question which may pass the Senate or may not, but which certainly has not during the past. Our experience during the last session was that, when other measures were tacked to this bill, the whole failed. We want this measure of justacked to this bill, the whole lahed. We want this measure of justice to these five States to stand upon its own bottom, separate and distinct of itself. Put them on a footing with other States; and then we will talk to you about general legislation, such as the Senator from Kansas has alluded to.

I hope that this bill will not be recommitted. I am satisfied that the Committee on Public Lands considered it thoroughly and well before they reported it, although I am not a member of that committee and cannot speak for it. I hope it will not be recommitted, but that it will stand upon its own merits and receive the judgment of the Senate, whatever that may be.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I omitted to call the attention of the Senate to the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that some general bill should be passed upon the subject of the disposition and sale of the pine and other timber lands of the United States. Among the arguments that he uses are the following:

Reasonable facilities for the purchase of timber lands being thus provided, the law against depredations which in the absence of surveys is practically inoperative could and ought to be rigorously and relentlessly enforced. The homestead and pre-comption laws have no possible application to this class of lands. It ought to be so declared by statute.

Again, in his remarks upon the action of Congress that is invoked on the very bill now under consideration, he says:

In addition to what I have said, looking toward a repeal of the existing prohibition against acquiring title to the lands in question by cash entry, it seems to me proper to suggest that these "timber lands" of the South, and all others of their class—that is, all of the unsold "offered lands," which are chiefly valuable for their timber—might well be made to fall within the rule of exclusion, to the extent, at least, of declaring them not subject to homestead, entry, which course has already been recommended in the case of the unoffered and unsurveyed timber lands.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas a question. I ask him whether he has read further in the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office a distinct and specific recommendation of this measure urged by an argument covering nearly two pages of his report, showing that these lands are being depredated upon, and that the only way to save the Government from loss is the passage of precisely the kind of bill now before us.

Mr. INGALLS. I read the recommendation that the restriction be repealed; but it is accompanied with the recommendation, further, upon page 10 of the report of the Interior Department, Executive Document 1, part 5, of this session, that a general law shall be passed for the disposition and sale of the pine and other timber lands of the United States, including those now under consideration. The Commissioner does specially recommend that the lands that are in these States subject now to this restriction shall be subject neither to homestead nor pre-emption entry nor private sale under existing land laws, but that a special system shall be devised for the survey, appraisal, and sale of the pine and other timber lands of the United States as

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I trust the motion of the Senator from Kansas will not be sustained. The law complained of, it seems to me, deprives the citizens of the five States of Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, and Louisiana of the same privileges and immunities which are extended to the citizens of the other States of this Union within which the public domain of the United States lies. The Constitution of the United States declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. Here in all the land States outside of these five a citizen can acquire the vacant public domain in any of the modes pre-scribed by law. Within these five States that public domain can only be acquired by homesteads. That is drawing a distinction, and not giving citizens of all the States the like privileges and immunities; and it seems to me that that point is worthy of consideration. If this be a Federal Union of co-equal States, as we all understand it to be, then why should citizens of the five States named be excluded from the privileges which are extended to the citizens of all the other States of the Union within whose limits there are public lands? I cannot see a reason for it.

But it has been said in the progress of debate that the original intent and design of this restriction was to aid the colored people. I apprehend there is not a Senator representing a southern State in this Chamber who does not know that the class of land which is vacant and public and subject to appropriation in these five States, is land that the colored people will never settle upon. They would starve upon that kind of land. You may go into any of these States now and you that kind of land. You may go into any of these States now and you will not find them there. You will find them on the rich bottom lands where there were the finest plantations before the war, and where there are many now; and they can make more money by paying rent upon that class of land and cultivating it, far more money than they can make by going out into the hills and cultivating the land there. Hence you will find it to be true—every Senator from the South knows it—that the colored people are settled upon the rich plantations; it is universally the case; and you may go through these hills and ride a day and not find any of these people settled there. That is my experience and I presume every southern Senator pere will agree that the rience, and I presume every southern Senator here will agree that the fact is so.

But, even admitting it to be true that this provision of law was originally designed and intended to benefit a particular class of persons, that would be class legislation, and class legislation ought not to be tolerated anywhere. By the fourteenth amendment they are made citizens like you and me, with all the rights, privileges, and immunities that you and I have; no greater, no less. Then why, I say, upon any ground, should citizens of these States be deprived of the same privileges and immunities of citizens of the other States and why privileges and immunities of citizens of the other States and why should there be class legislation in favor of any class? But, in point of fact, this legislation does not benefit that class, because they do not take this land. What, then, is the effect? The South is recovering from the effects of the war. This timber is a necessity to the prairie countries. If this land could be appropriated in any of the modes known to the law, the timber would be cut up, sawed, converted into lumber and he used for females and building account. into lumber, and be used for fencing and building purposes on the prairie lands. As it is now, it is locked up, and useless for any beneficial purposes.

Believing that this is a restriction which in justice ought not to be allowed, depriving the citizens of five States of the privileges which the citizens of other States have, and believing that as a matter of wise economy the timber on these lands ought to be placed in a con-wise economy the timber on these lands ought to be placed in a condition where it may be utilized, I support the measure of the Senator from Arkansas who has introduced this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas, in referring to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, did not do that report justice. I thought the Senator from Minnesota, the other day, had called the attention of the Senator from Kansas and of the Senate to the recommendation of the Commissioner upon this particular subject. It is not fair to cite the opin-ion of the Commissioner on one subject in support of or against a measure relative to another. He has given his opinion upon this particular subject, and his opinion has been cited by the Senator from Kansas in reference to a different matter. What does he say in regard to this restriction?

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the Senator will not leave me under the imputation of having improperly or imperfectly quoted the report of the Commissioner.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly not.
Mr. INGALLS. I certainly read from page 18 of the report of the Interior Department, which relates specially to what is known as the act of June 21, 1866, which is now embodied in section 2303 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The object of the bill introduced by the Senator from Arkansas is simply to repeal what is admitted by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to be an obnoxious restriction, and it is so regarded by the people of the States to which that restriction applies, and I can say that it is so regarded by them without respect to party. It is not a party question; and when the representatives of those people on this floor, without regard to party, urge, as they do, the repeal of this obnoxious provision, I think it ought to have some weight with the Senators from other sections. Now what does the Commissioner say:

This restriction is continued in force, and is now found embodied in section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Whatever may have been the exigencies which, at the time of the passage of this act, seemed to justify its policy of exclusion, certain it is that there are not now existing, nor likely to arise in the future, any conditions rendering its continuance

It is unequal and obnoxious, in that it denies to citizens of the States named the equal privileges enjoyed by their fellow-citizens of other States with respect to lands within their borders. For this reason the section ought to be repealed; but added to this is another reason of grave importance why an early repeal is desirable. In the States to which this act refers a large, and perhaps the largest, portion of the public lands remaining to the Government is covered with valuable timber.

He urges this as an argument in favor of its repeal:

It is "offered land," and would be in the market for cash sale at private entry but or the act of 1866. The soil of most of this land is notoriously barren, and is valuable only for its timber.

Which is true.

Which is true.

Since the close of the war of the rebellion attention has been attracted to these timbered tracts, and in many localities they have been subject to wholesale depredation, their product forming the basis of a large commerce, employing extensive mills for manufacture, ships for transportation, being distributed generally along the Atlantic seaboard. The wrong thus done the Treasury is not altogether carried on in open defiance of the law, but there is, to some extent, an observance of its forms. Laborers employed in lumbering operations are induced to make homestead entry of desirable tracts and there is thus obtained shelter from interruption while the work of removing the timber goes on. Once removed, the land is abandoned, and thenceforward, for an indefinite period, may be considered as useless for any purpose. for any purpose.

And that is the condition it will be in if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts were to become a law. port of the argument made by the Commissioner that fraud is being committed under color of this law, I ask the Secretary to read from the report of the surveyor-general of Louisiana, one of the States interested in this subject, what he says in regard to the practical workings of this law.

The Secretary read as follows, from the report of O. H. Brewster, surveyor-general of Louisiana, dated September 1, 1874:

The Secretary read as follows, from the report of O. H. Brewster, surveyor-general of Louisiana, dated September 1, 1874:

The law is especially open to these objections in this State. I cannot better explain my views than by referring to the just remarks of one of my predecessors, Hon. John Lyuch, in his report for 1870, and contained in the annual report for that year, page 334. Since that date, however, the lapse of time has justified the opinions then expressed, and afforded the most conclusive evidence of the inutility of the law as a mode of colopizing the public domain with bona fide settlers, or even of making any considerable disposition of it. The act went into effect in this State soon after its passage, and from the records of the United States consolidated land office in this city (embracing about half the State in point of area) it is clear that it has in no manner answered the object of its creators. Up to this time there have been 4,040 entries, and of this number 1,048 were made more than five years ago.

By law the settler has the option at any time after five years from date of entry to make final proof and receive his final certificate, on which patent issues in due course; and this final proof is required to be made within two years thereafter, (that is, within seven years from date of entry,) or the entry will be forfeited. The seven years' limit has clapsed in 259 cases. Now, there have been up to date only 65 cases in which final proof has been made and final certificates issued. So that of the 1,048 entries in which the settler might have made final proof, and of the 259 entries in which they were compelled by law to do it, they have only made it in 65.

With reference to the entries over five years-old, not yet proved up, charity may suggest that within the seven years the settlers may yet proved up, charity may suggest that within the seven years have expired, and no intention to comply with the law is manifest, and no proof filled to show there was such an intention, the bare facts a

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Now, sir, it appears from the report of the surveyor-general of Louisiana that out of four thousand entries that might have been perfected into titles under the homestead law only about sixty-five were ever completed. This shows the truth of what the Commissioner has said, that these entries were made for the purpose of fraud, with a fraudulent view of cutting off the timber. That is what the Senators from Arkansas and Mississippi have said, and it Shows the practical workings of this law.

Now, sir, I do not believe in the doctrine of hoarding the public domain. I think it would be better to let it all go under the control of private ownership. I do not agree with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Oglesby,] who said it would be a misfortune for the lands to be disposed of soon. No, sir; private energy will go much further than the Government in facilitating settlements. It never has been the policy of this Government to hold the public domain for the purpose of looking out for the future. The Government in that respect has looked only to the present. It would be better to-day if the entire public domain of the United States were in the hands of private owners than in the hands of the Government; I care not under what system the title may be acquired. But, so far as this law is concerned, the great objection is that it is against equality, and a great writer has said that equality is equity. All we ask is that the States of the South that are restricted by the provisions of this law shall be placed on an equality with the other States of this Union, and after that is done if the Senator from Massas or done, if the Senator from Kansas or the Senator from Massachusetts desires that a new system shall be inaugurated which shall apply to all the States alike, I will go with them and assist in devising some system which will apply equally to all the States of the Union.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands with instructions to report a general bill.

The motion was not agreed to. Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CLAYTON. We are just about passing the bill now. Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. If there is to be no more speaking, I will withdraw the motion for the purpose of allowing a vote to be taken.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amend-ments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted-yeas 41, nays 17; as follows:

So the bill was passed. Mr. CLAYTON. I mov I move to amend the title by inserting after the word "Florida" the words "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened and (at four o'clock and twenty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 15, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of their clerks, informed the House that Mr. Davis had been appointed in place of Mr. Thurman, excused, a manager on the part of the Senate on the conference agreed to upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills of the following titles: A bill (S. No. 25) granting the right of way to the Leavenworth Street Railroad Company across the Fort Leavenworth military res-

SESSIONS OF COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I am instructed by the Joint Committee on Printing, in consequence of the amount of business before that committee, to request permission to sit during the sessions of the House. There was no objection, and leave was accordingly granted.

INTEREST-BEARING OBLIGATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Congress of the United States passed an act approved March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," and providing for the payment in coin or its equivalent of the interest-bearing obligations of the United States; and whereas said act was virtually a violation of various acts providing for the issue of certain bonds and obligations of the United States, especially those known as five-twenties, the principal of which at the time of their issue was underderstood to be payable in the lawful money of the United States, and so expressed in substance by both the political parties of the country in national convention, the republican convention of 1868 declaring that the national honor required the payment of the public indebtedness in the uttermost to the creditors at home and abroad not only according to the letter but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted, and the democratic party of the same year declaring that where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide, that they shall be paid in coin, they ought in right and justice to be paid in the lawful money of the United States; and whereas said act, being no part of the original contract in letter or in spirit, was without consideration and therefore repealable at the will of any subsequent Congress; and whereas it was unjust, unequal, and oppressive legislation, greatly increasing the amount to be paid by the Government, and has inured, and as long as it exists will continue to inure, to the benefit of bondholders and capitalists and the positive detriment of the property and labor of the people: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said act, approved March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," be, and is hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reception of this joint resolution and its reference to the Committee on Banking and Cur-

Mr. GARFIELD. It should go to the Committee of Ways and Means, should it not?

The SPEAKER. The mover prefers the Committee on Banking and Currency

Mr. GARFIELD. I certainly think it should go to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The functions of these two committees overlap in so many instances that the Chair is inclined to think it does not make much difference to which committee this matter may go.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not care very much about it. There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD FROM NEW ORLEANS TO SHREVEPORT, LOUISIANA.

Mr. DARRALL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire whether the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburgh Railroad Company, to which a grant of land was made by the provisions of section 22 of chapter 122 of act of 1871, approved March 3, 1871, to aid in the construction of a railroad from New Orleans to Shreveport, Louisiana, have constructed the whole or any part of said road, and whether under existing circumstances it would be for the public interest to extend the time for the completion of said railroad, or to transfer said grant to some other railroad company engaged in the construction of a railroad from New Orleans to Shreveport, Louisiana, or whether said grant should be declared forfeited to the Government.

INDIAN BOUNTY FRAUDS.

Mr. GAUSE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Attorney-General of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior be, and they are hereby, requested to furnish to the House certified copies of all papers and records in their respective Departments relating to the complicity of William P. Ross, formerly a Cherokee Indian delegate, in the alleged Indian bounty frauds of John W. Wright,

APPOINTMENT OF DELEGATES UPON COMMITTEES.

Mr. FORT. The Committee on the Territories have unanimously instructed me to report the following resolution and ask its adop-

Resolved. That the Committee on the Rules be requested to inquire into the expediency and justice of reporting an amendment to the rules under which Delegates from the Territories shall be appointed on the following committees with the same privileges they have in the House, to wit: Committee on Indian Affairs, Military Affairs, Mines and Mining, Pacific Railroad, Public Lands, Private Land Claims, Post-Office and Post-Roads, and Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

GOLD AVAILABLE FOR SPECIE RESUMPTION.

Mr. SAYLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to report to this body within ten days the actual amount of gold owned by the Government available for the resumption of specie payments, after deducting the amount of gold certificates now outstanding, accrued interest on Government bonds and bonds called for the sinking fund to this date.

JOHN JOHNSON.

Mr. STEVENSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2129) granting a pension to John Johnson, of McLean County, Illinois, a soldier of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN T. SILVERNAIL.

Mr. STEVENSON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2130) granting a pension to John T. Silvernail, of Mason County, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. FLORENCE PEARCE.

Mr. STEVENSON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2131) granting to Mrs. Florence Pearce, of Tazewell County, Illinois, an additional pension; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to

TRANSFER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS TO WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (H. R. No. 987) to transfer the conduct of Indian affairs from the Interior Department to the War Department; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

REPAIR OF MISSISSIPPI LEVEES

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved. That when the river and harbor appropriation bill is before the House it shall be in order to offer an amendment to said bill making such appropriation for the repair of the levees of the Mississippi River as may be recommended by the Committee on Mississippi Levees.

Mr. RANDALL and others objected.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent to offer for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved. That permission be granted to a subcommittee of the Committee on the Mississippi Levees, of such number as may be appointed, together with their clerk, to visit the inundated regions of the Mississippi Valley for the purpose of obtaining such information as will enable them to determine the necessity and amount of an appropriation to rebuild the levees and protect said valley from inundation: Provided, That said visit by said committee shall not be made at the public expense.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this resolution is not in order.
The SPEAKER. If there be objection, it is not.
Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour begins at seventeen minutes before one o'clock.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 305) to change the location of the consulates at Aix-la-Chapelle and at Omoa and Truxillo; and

An act (H. R. No. 217) donating condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Ladies' Monumental Association of Allegheny County, for monumental purposes.

SURVEY OF ECHO HARBOR, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a let-The SPEARER, by unanimous consent, laid before the rouse a feter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1875, the report of Lieutenant-Colonel John Newton, of the Corps of Engineers, on the survey of Echo Harbor, New Rochelle, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CONVEYANCE OF GROUNDS TO NEWPORT, KENTUCKY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Adjutant-General on the bill (H. R. No. 1055) to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to the city of Newport, Kentucky, certain grounds; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SHREWSBURY HARBOR, NEW JERSEY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a provision of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1875, a report of he survey of the north and south branches of the Shrewsbury River, New Jersey; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER. I believe these reports of surveys, if sent in time, would have been printed in the Engineer's report. I think they should now be ordered to be printed. They are surveys, I believe, ordered by the House last year.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say, in reference to these numerous small reports, which seem to be mere responses to inquiries on the part of the House, that it is quite unnecessary to order them to be printed. Unless they possess special public importance and have wider range than a mere locality the Chair does not see why they should be ordered to be printed. He has therefore been acting under the impression that it is not the pleasure of the House to order the printing of unnecessary matter.

Mr. CONGER. I thought they were reports of surveys heretofore ordered under acts of Congress. If they are only in response to House resolutions that is another thing.

The SPEAKER. Many of them are in response to resolutions and some in response to previous requirements of law in appropriation bills. Whenever it is the desire of the House to have these things printed the Chair will most gladly yield to the wish of the House.

PRINTING DONE FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also lays before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the work done for the War Department and each separate Bureau by the Government Printing Office during two years ending December 31, 1875. Accompanying this letter is a bagful of records, which, unless otherwise ordered, the Chair will direct to be referred to the Joint Committee on Printing, without being ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PAY OF TROOPS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Paymaster-General United States Army, requesting a separate act be passed appropriating $500,000 for the payment of troops from June 15 to June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

GRAND RIVER HARBOR, OHIO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a statement of Lieutenant-Colonel C. E. Blunt, Corps of Engineers, in relation to the improvement of Grand River Harbor, Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WILLIAM F. BLOOR.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of William F. Bloor, for pay as second lieutenant from June 18, 1863, to November 8, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Military

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of the report of Colonel J. H. Simpson, Corps of Engineers, of his survey in con-nection with the improvements of the Mississippi River between Saint Louis and Cairo; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BREAKWATER, SAN LUIS OBISPO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the report of the Secretary of War on the bill (H. R. No. 139) to authorize the construction of a breakwater at San Luis Obispo Harbor, California; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WEST HAVEN HARBOR, CONNECTICUT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1875, the report of Major J. W. Barlow, Corps of Engineers, of the survey of the channel of West Haven Harbor, near New Haven, Connecticut; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REQUEST TO VOTE.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, if there be no objection, I should like to ask unanimous consent of this House to have my vote recorded in the negative upon the resolution introduced yesterday by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Hale.]

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman was present and voted, and his name is not recorded, the Journal will be corrected, but he cannot have his vote recorded if he was not present or did not vote. He has accomplished his purpose, however, for the statement which he has just made goes into the RECORD.

Mr. ODELLL. If present, I would have voted in the negative on that resolution.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The regular order this morning is the call of committees for reports of a public nature, commencing with the Commitmittee on Patents, the call resting with the Committee on Patents.

CHARLES H. FONDÉ.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1440) to enable Charles H. Fondé to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of letters-patent for improvement in dredging-machines.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read. It provides that the petition of Charles H. Fondé, of Mobile, Alabama, for extension of letters-patent for an improvement in dredging-machines, granted the 17th day of April, improvement in dredging-machines, granted the 17th day of April, 1855, No. 12720, and extended by the Commissioner of Patents for seven years from the 17th day of April, 1869, which term will expire on the 17th day of April, 1876, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Commissioner of Patents, with full power and authority to hear and determine the same; and, if, after hearing the said petition, upon due notice to the public according to the practice of the Patent-Office in cases of extension, the said Commissioner should decide that said activities are by the boundary of the practice of the Patent-Office in cases of extension, the said Commissioner should decide that said petition ought to be granted, he is hereby authorized and empowered to extend said letters-patent for seven years from the 17th day of April, 1876, to said Charles H. Fondé.
Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I ask that the report accompanying the bill may be read.

The report was read. The committee stated that they had exampapers accompanying the petition of Charles H. Fondé, and the affidavit of the petitioner, and also received his statement, and are of opinion that the said Fondé has made every effort in his power to perfect and put into use the dredging-machine for which he seeks an extension of patent. He has expended large sums of money in the several attempts, but from adverse circumstances which he could not control has suffered great loss. With others he has lost three machines, one by an explosion of the boiler and two by other accidents, rendering them nearly a total loss. The committee find that the machine of which Fondé is the inventor is not of such a character that the general interests of the public would be damaged or interfered with should the application be granted. No opposition whatever is offered to the application, and the committee therefore were of the unanimous opinion that the bill should pass, and so recommended.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr.

CALDWELL.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. It will be observed that the Committee on Patents have made a unanimous report in favor of granting the prayer of the petitioner, Charles II. Fondé. I feel sure, sir, that, if the House had in its possession all the facts which have been submitted to the Committee on Patents, there would not be a dissenting voice as to the justice or propriety of granting this prayer. I invite the attention of the House to a short statement of the facts in the case, and I ask especially the attention of gentlemen on this side of the House that they may thoroughly understand the facts, and if possible give me an opportunity to remove the objections which on a previous day rested in their minds against this bill.

In the year 1847 Mr. Fondé, a mere youth, had his mind directed to the importance of machines of sufficient power and capacity to dredge our harbors and rivers. He went to work and invented such a machine, and after seven or eight long years he submitted a model to the Patent Office and upon it obtained a patent. In the year 1854, by the aid of friends he was enabled to construct a machine and presented it to the public in an experiment, I believe, in the waters of New York Bay. By the carelessness of the engineer the boiler exploded, which resulted in the destruction of the machine and in the injury of the applicant.

Shortly thereafter, through the aid of other friends, Mr. Fondé succeeded in building a second machine, which he called Pioneer No. 2. That machine when it was ready for work, lying in the waters of New York Bay, was run over and destroyed by a bark, the Peru, that was passing out of the harbor. Thus the second machine was destroyed. Mr. Fondé still had faith in his invention, and he persuaded friends to assist him in constructing the third machine, and when that was completed he entered into a contract with the Long Dock Company of Jersey City, hoping from that contract to realize some profit. But in 1857 the panic came on, the Long Dock Company failed, Mr. Fondé failed, and his friends failed. From that time until the beginning of the war there were no enterprises in the country demanding or requiring the use of such a machine.

Prior to the war Mr. Fondé returned to the city of Mobile. He was thus cut off during the war from those who had assisted him in the construction of the machine, which was wrecked and was sold for wharfage or dockage. His partners or friends who had aided him died during the war in the city of New York. Thus his machine was gone and his friends were gone.

In the year 1869 Mr. Fondé made application to the Patent Office stating all these facts, and had his patent extended. But he had no means. He interested, however, other friends, and has now constructed the fourth machine, costing $50,000, and it is lying in the harbor of Baltimore ready to do work.

Now, if it be true that patents are intended as a premium upon the genius and talent of the country, and are intended to indemnify persons for their study, for their skill, and for the means which they employ to produce something useful, will this House under all these circumstances deny Mr. Fondé the right to go before the Commissioner of Patents and make an application for the extension of his patent? If ever there was a case, it seems to me, that commends itself favorably to the consideration of members of this House, whether democrats or republicans, this is the case. Mr. Fondé and his friends have expended largely, to the amount of over $100,000, in the construction of these several machines; and they have not realized more than $25,000 or $26,000. Now, I trust that the House will grant this privilege to a man who has spent long years, and who has spent his money in the accomplishment of that which mechanics and artisans for two hundred years had been making unsuccessful efforts to accomplish. His patent expires on the 17th of April next, and if this privilege, this extension, is not granted to him he will be remitted to poverty, while the country will get the benefit of his long years of toil and labor.

If I have stated anything that is not warranted by the facts submitted to the committee, I beg them to correct me. If I have stated the facts as they are and as they have been proved before the committee, I beg the House to pass the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was first reported, I made objection to its passage on the general ground of opposition to a second renewal of a patent. Since it comes back a second time, with the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Patents, I do not feel justified in further opposition to the bill or in voting against it.

The question was put on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and on a division there were ayes 89, noes not counted. So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 132, nays 97, not

So the bill was passed.
During the roll-call,
Mr. BLAND said: I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. HATCHER, is sick and necessarily absent from the House.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to recon-sider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF HORTICULTURE AND FLORICULTURE.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Patents, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 182) to encourage the production of new and valuable fruits and plants; and the same was laid on the table.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM A. GRAHAM.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, also, from the same committee, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H.R. No. 431) for the relief of the heirs of William A. Graham; and the same was laid on the table.

TAXATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2132) to regulate the assessment and collection of taxes for the support of the government of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SURETIES OF INDIAN AGENTS, ETC. .

Mr. SCALES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill H. R. No. 2133) to amend section 10 of an act making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending June 30, 1576, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read in full, as follows:

The bill was read in full, as follows:

That section 10 of the act making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending June 30, 1876, be amended so as to read as follows:

That hereafter the surety or sureties upon the bond to be given by each Indian agent, subagent, and special agent appointed by the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, or other competent authority, before entering upon the duties of his office, shall file a sworn statement with the Secretary of the Interior setting forth the nature and kind of property owned by such surety or sureties, the value of the same, and where situated; and that no moneys appropriated by any act of Congress or otherwise and no trust fund or any other public funds appropriated or set apart for the benefit of any Indian or Indians shall be paid to any Indian agent, subagent, or special agent to be hereafter appointed, and no public property of any kind, whether designed for the use of Indians or for any other purpose, shall be turned over to any Indian agent, subagent, or special agent to be hereafter appointed, until the surety or sureties shall have filed such statement. Each Indian agent shall keep a book of itemized expenditures of every kind, with a record of all contracts, together with the receipts of money from all sources, and the books thus kept shall always be open to inspection; and the said books shall remain in the office at the respective reservations, not to be removed from said reservation by said agent, but shall be safely kept and handed over to his successor; and true transcripts of all entries of every character in said books shall be forwarded quarterly by each agent to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; Provided, That should any agent knowingly make any false entry in said books or in the transcripts directed to be forwarded to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or shall knowingly fail to keep a perfect entry in said books as herein prescrib

Mr. SCALES. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Interior be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Department of the Interior,

Washington, December 11, 1875.

Sir: I have the honor to invite your attention to section 10 of the act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending June 30, 1876, which is as follows:

"That hereafter the security or securities upon the bond required by the act of February 27, 1851, to be given by each Indian agent before entering upon the duties of his office, shall file a sworn statement with the Secretary of the Interior, setting forth the nature and kind of property owned by such security or securities, the value of the same, and where situated; and that no money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any Indian agent hereafter appointed until the security or securities shall have filed such statement. Each Indian agent shall keep a book of itemized expenditures of every kind, with a record of all contracts, together with the receipts of money from all sources; and the books thus kept shall always be open to inspection; and the said books shall remain in the office at the respective reservations, not to be removed from said reservation by said agent, but shall be safely kept and handed over to his successor; and true transcripts of all entries of every character in said books shall be forwarded quarterly by each agent to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Provided, That should any agent knowingly make any false entry in said books or in the transcripts directed to be forwarded to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or shall knowingly fail to keep a perfect entry in said books, as herein prescribed, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction before any United States court having jurisdiction of such offense, shall be fined in a sum not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, at the discretion of the court, and shall be rendered incompetent to hold said office of Indian agents in the employ of the Government. I have required the Indian Office to extend the provision of s

The Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Speaker, I will simply state that the object of this amendment to the law is to place all the Indian agents, &c., on the same footing, with the same bonds and securities, and there s very high propriety in passing it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER (the morning hour having expired) reported from the Committee on Appropriations a bill (H. R. No. 2134) making appropriation for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WHEELER. The bill embraces but half a dozen items, and

I ask unanimous consent that it be considered now in the House.

There was no objection.
The Clerk read the bill as follows:

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

That the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications and other works of defense, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War; also the following sums for armament of fortifications, namely:

For the armament of sea-coast fortifications, including heavy guns, Gattling guns, and howitzers for flank defense, carriages, projectiles, fuses, powder, and implements, their trial and proof, and all necessary expenses incident thereto, $165,000.

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be sold, in such manner, and at such times and places, and in such quantities as shall most conduce to the interests of the United States, all obsolete and condemned projectiles for heavy ordnance now on hand and stored in the various arsemals of the United States, and to cause the net proceeds of such sales, after paying the necessary expenses attending the same, to be covered into the Treasury of the United States, with full account of said expenses.

Note.—The total sum recommended by this bill is $315,000.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read

a third time

Mr. WHEELER. The estimates sent in for this purpose for the next fiscal year were in round numbers $3,500,000. The bill reported appropriates $315,000, so marked a reduction as naturally to excite comment. Yet while the Committee on Appropriations have differed in relation to the policy adopted in regard to some of the appropriation bills, they are a unit in believing that the reduction proposed by this bill may safely be made.

We have in our arsenals immense accumulations of ordnance and ordnance stores. Every cemetery of the land that cares to ask for them obtains condemned cannon and cannon-balls for monumental purposes, as the many bills for that purpose passed by Congress will abundantly testify. The Book of Estimates itself furnishes complete proof of the redundancy of ordnance stores. The Department asks for an appropriation of a quarter of a million of dollars for the purchase of new projectiles and for heavy ordnance, and that is accompanied by a request for authority for the Department to sell obsolete and condemned projectiles and ordnance stores. And yet those stores were asked for with as much earnestness as these are now asked for. If the request should be granted, the resulting manufactures would soon become the prey of devouring rust and take their place with the obsolete and the condemned.

With constant improvements in guns and projectiles, in the judg-ment of the committee it would be most wasteful and extravagant to accumulate larger stores, which any day may be superseded by better patterns. In any great emergency, as was proven by the results of the late war, we may with safety and reliance turn to the iron manufactories of the country, where work is equally well done and certainly far more cheaply than in our arsenals and armories under the eight-hour system and under the system of illimitable red tape and superintendence that prevails in our Government arsenals. We may safely at all times rely upon our ordnance officers, who are certainly among the most skillful in the world, for the most improved models.

among the most skillful in the world, for the most improved motels. With these advantages, and with our innumerable iron manufactories and inexhaustible fields of coal and iron, we may safely abide any event.

To the most unprofessional mind it is evident that hereafter we must rely for the protection particularly of our scaboard cities upon must rely for the protection particularly of our scaboard cities upon the use of iron-clads and the torpedo system of defense. It is a reflection upon our Navy and upon the skill and spirit of our people to admit for a moment that we would allow an enemy to approach unhindered within striking distance of our cities.

But, independent of all this, this is the centennial year. We want no shotted guns pointed seaward. For this year at least there ought to be a lull in the manufacture of implements of human destruction. We have voted a million and a half of dollars to provide for making the nations of the world our guests, and to show them, as we shall show them, how invincible we are outside of fortifications and the the nations of the world our guests, and to show them, as we shall show them, how invincible we are outside of fortifications and the other enginery of war. In my judgment that is to be one of the best results of our great national exhibition. Foreign nations will learn, they will see for themselves, the material out of which we can rapidly improvise vast armies, and the resources with which we can feed, clothe, and transport millions of men in arms. As I have said, in my judgment this is to be one of the best and most productive results of the great exhibition. The nations of the world will take away with them a knowledge of us and of our resources which will teach them them a knowledge of us and of our resources which will teach them that, while we have the disposition to accord to all in every clime their just rights, we have the spirit and the power to demand and secure them for ourselves.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish only to add that it is a source of very great

Mr. KANDALL. I wish only to add that it is a source of very great satisfaction to find the Committee on Appropriations a unit in respect to this bill. I have no doubt that that exhibition will be gratifying to the people of this country.

There is one consideration which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wheeler] omitted to mention, which I think induced the committee to largely reduce the appropriations asked for. That is, that there is not the discharge to work housing the tiff we shall deal into the there is not the slightest apprehension that if we shall deal justly by other nations there will be any conflict of arms between us and any foreign power. The appropriations heretofore made seemed to the committee to have been altogether too large. For instance, experience has shown that the best means of resisting an armed force, whether of artillery on land or of iron-clads on the water, is by earthworks. That I believe is the universal judgment of all those who were engaged in the artillery struggles of the recent war. Therefore it is that the Committee on Appropriations feel, and I am glad to repeat the words of the gentleman in charge of this bill, [Mr. WHEELER,] that no material interest will suffer in the least degree by this reduction. tion, either as regards our fortifications or the experiments to be made in the trial of armament or torpedoes.

I may state here that it is a singular fact that the 15-inch guns which were deemed the best from 1859 to 1865 are now not regarded as so important, are not deemed as sufficient to resist any iron-clad of the first class. It is true that other countries are experimenting largely in connection with arms and the heavier machinery of destruction in warfare through the agency of guns. All that we appreciate, and of it we shall get the benefit. It is impossible to throw a Chinese wall, as it were, around the intelligence of the world in connection with these subjects. Whatever experiments we may make traverse the length and breadth of the land; and so it is with experiments by other nations; we realize the benefit of those experiments. Therefore no interest whatever can suffer by reason of these reductions.

Mr. WHEELER. If no gentlemen desires to ask any questions, I

Mr. WHEELER. If no gentlemen desires to ask any questions, I will call for the previous question.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would be glad to have the gentleman state the amount appropriated by the present bill and also the amount appropriated by the corresponding bill of last year.

Mr. WHEELER. The amount appropriated last year was $1,022,000; the amount appropriated by this bill is $315,000.

I wish to express my assent to what the chairman of the committee.

I wish to express my assent to what the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Mr. RANDALL,] has said in relation to the expenses of the Ordnance Department. My former experience in connection with Army appropriations taught me that that was one of the most extravagant Departments of the Government. We have now (I do not speak without due consideration) millions of dollars of accumulated useless ordnance stores. In the last Congress I brought in a bill for the sale of surplus lead. I found, on examination last year, that we had eighteen years' supply of lead; and I learned that we might safely sell a million dollars' worth of it. At a proper time I shall introduce, through the Committee on Appropriations, a section into some of these appropriation bills which shall direct the Secretary of War to sell all obsolete and condemned ordnance stores; for our arsenals fairly groan with their accumulation. I think that this bill appropriates every dollar that the Government needs at this time. I call for the previous question. of the most extravagant Departments of the Government. We have call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. TUCKER. I would like to make a report.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman.

EXECUTION OF CUSTOM-HOUSE BONDS.

Mr. TUCKER. The Committee of Ways and Means directed me some time ago to make a report on the bill (H. R. No. 1192) relating to the execution of custom-house bonds. I am directed to report back a substitute for that bill; and I ask that it may be acted on now and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Blackburn.) Does the gentleman desire that the substitute shall be considered in place of the original bill?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

The substitute (H. R. No. 2135) was read. It provides that when any bond is required by law to be executed by any firm or partnership for the payment of duties upon goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States by or for the use and benefit of such firm or partnership, the execution of such bond by any member of such firm or partnership shall bind the other members or partners thereof in like manner and to the same extent as if such other members or partners had personally executed the same; and any action or bers or partners had personally executed the same; and any action or suit may be instituted on such bond against all the members or partners of such firm as if all the members or partners had executed the

Mr. TUCKER. As I understand, it has been a matter of very great inconvenience that under the existing law, where a custom-house bond is required of a firm, all the members of the firm are obliged to join in its execution. The measure now reported proposes to allow one member of the firm to execute such a bond, and thereby bind all the members of the firm or partnership to the same extent as if each of them had executed it.

Mr. KASSON. I did not understand whether the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Tucker] stated that if a member of a firm executed a bond in the firm name for this purpose it should bind the firm, or if he executed it in the name of any single member of the firm for firm business it should bind the firm.

Mr. TUCKER. The provision of the bill is that wherever a bond is required of a firm for the payment of custom duties on goods, wares, or merchandise imported by or for their use, and it is executed by any member of the firm under that requisition, it shall be equally binding on all the members of the firm as if they had executed it.

Mr. KASSON. The only question that occurs to me is whether we can by law bind parties who are not on the face of the bond bound; for that is different from a liability under the common law. In other words, the question is whether, if one member of a firm signs his individual name to a bond, although it concerns firm business, we can by force of our statute bind by that act every other member of the firm who might be interested in the result but might not have assented to the giving of the bond.

Mr. TUCKER. I have no doubt about the power of Congress to make the act obligatory upon all the members of the firm under these circumstances; but if the gentleman has any doubt about it I have no objection to the insertion of the words which he suggests, "in the name of the firm.

Mr. KASSON. I have great confidence in the report of the committee; and if they have considered that point, whether we can create a statutory liability against the face of a written instrument—

Mr. TUCKER. I have no doubt about our power on that point; but I would like of course to remove any doubts upon the other side of the House on this question, and have no objection to inserting the words the gentleman suggests.

Mr. KASSON. I do not know what words would cure the difficulty.

The point of doubt is this: When John Smith, of the firm of John Smith & Co., gives a bond to the Government in his individual name, although there may be a beneficiary interest resulting to other par-ties, can we by statute say that these other parties who never as-sented to the written instrument shall be bound without their consent sented to the written instrument shall be bound without their consent by the act of a party whose individual name the Government accepts? Mr. TUCKER. I have no doubt about that. Mr. KASSON. There is the difficulty which I see as a lawyer; but if the committee has considered our ability to do that thing and are satisfied we have the power, I do not propose any amendment. Mr. TUCKER. I can explain in a very few words. The Clerk will send the bill back to me.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The gentlemen from Virginia will.

send the bill back to me.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The gentleman from Virginia will allow me to say that the point suggested by the gentleman from Iowa I do not think was discussed by the Committee of Ways and Means. I do not think it arises. The bill provides where a bond is required in the name of a firm that then the bond may be signed by one member of the firm. This is done for the convenience of those partners ber of the firm. This is done for the convenience of those partners who cannot be present personally to execute the bond or who cannot personally execute the bond jointly with the other partners without great inconvenience. It is in the interest of commerce and for the convenience of merchants, and I do not think there should be any objection interposed to the passage of the bill.

Mr. HALE. Even supposing that to be so, looking beyond this to the question of remedial power, where does the gentleman from Illinois, or the gentleman from Virginia, who reports this bill, find any power in any legislative body to enact that where a single party has signed a contract with the Government any other party shall be held signed a contract with the Government any other party shall be held in a court of law bound and pledged under that contract? Now, the point raised by the gentleman from Iowa seems to me to be of great force, and I should go further than he has done. It does not rest in my mind as a matter of doubt, but it seems to me, looking beyond the convenience of the merchant to the right of the Government to enforce its contract, they are going too far. There will be no power to hold the partner who has not signed the bond, although you may declare as a matter of convenience the bond may be signed by

Mr. TUCKER. I think I can remove all difficulty. The terms of the act, as reported, are that "when any bond is required by law to be executed by any firm or partnership for the payment of duties on goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States by or goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States by or for the use and benefit of such firm or partnership." Now, by the law merchant, as I apprehend, if one partner under such circumstances signs a parol-instrument, the firm would be bound. The only question is, when it is a signed and sealed instrument, by common law they would not be bound. Now, the proposition of the committee is that if one partner, in a case where a firm would be bound by parol contract executed by one party, seals the instrument, the other parties shall be alike bound as if they had sealed it. I think there can be no doubt about it. It would remove all difficulty. But there is no necessity to have any difficulty. I would insert the words suggested by the gentleman from lowa: "The execution of such bond by any member of such firm or partnership in the name of such firm or partnership shall bind the other members."

Mr. HALE. Would you not put in the other words: "With and by the consent of the firm?"

Mr. TUCKER. I do not think that it is necessary. If the bond is

Mr. TUCKER. I do not think that it is necessary. If the bond is required of them for goods imported for their use, one has the right for the others.

Mr. HALE. It is upon the theory that it is a part of the business

Mr. TUCKER. That was the purpose of the original bill, that whatever one partner did in the course of business of the firm bound

Mr. CONGER. I would ask the gentleman whether it would not also be well to include in the bill the case when such a firm is consignee ?

Mr. TUCKER. I would have some difficulty about that, because the firm might be the consignee of goods, when they would not be justified in entering into any contract for payment of duty, and one member might not be able to bind the other members of the firm. I put it, that where the goods are imported by or for the use of the firm, this is in the course of their business and one partner binds the

Mr. LAWRENCE. Suppose the partnership contract provides that a partner shall not sign any sealed instrument which shall bind the individual members of the partnership except those who sign it, will it be possible by statute for one member of such a partnership as that to have the power, notwithstanding the terms of the partnership contract, to sign a sealed instrument in the name of the firm which shall bind all the members of the firm?

Now I apprehend that there would be no difficulty in providing by law that, as to all partnerships hereafter entered into, the act of one member of the partnership, either in his individual name or signing the partnership name, in executing a sealed instrument, would be obligatory on all the individual members of the partnership, because in such a case as that the law would enter into and become a part of

Mr. HALE. Every contract would be made in subordination to it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Precisely; as my friend suggests, every contract hereafter made would be in subordination to it. But that is not the case I am now contemplating. This bill is so framed as to apply to partnerships which have been heretofore entered into. And there are doubtless cases of partnership, where the terms of the partnership contract provide that the active members of the firm shall not undertake to bind those who are not active members by a sealed instrument. Now we propose by this bill, in its broad and comprehensive terms, to give to the active members of a partnership firm the power to bind silent partners, who would not, if they knew they ran the risk of incurring such liability, enter into any such partnership contract at all.

It seems to me that this bill ought to be carefully guarded, and ought to protect the rights of those silent partners and other partners who by the terms of the partnership contract run no risk now of being bound by any sealed instrument.

Mr. HALE. Take, for instance, the contract which has been suggested, a contract of partnership, with limitations as to signatures under seal by the different partners; can you by any legislation impair the strength of such a contract any more than of any other contract that is a thing of the past? In reference to a partnership exist-tract that is a thing of the past? In reference to a partnership existing under such a contract and the rights of partners to-day being controlled and guided by the instrument of partnership already made, can you by legislation here impair the obligation of that?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Let me suggest that by the law at present, as I understand it, and as was stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Tucker,] one partner cannot bind his copartner by an instrument under seal.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That all depends upon his authority.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. But if he has an authority it must also be by an instrument under seal. Now, that is the law in respect to all these obligations. I cannot see the force of the suggestion or objection that we cannot change the law in regard to existing partnerships.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Existing partnerships the terms of which exclude the power of acting partners to sign sealed instruments binding the others.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. That is the law in relation to all existing partnerships. No law permits a partner to bind his copart-ner by instrument under seal unless the partner has express power to bind his copartner.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The articles of copartnership may themselves be under seal, and may give all the powers of the partnership to any partner.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. If such powers exist, if they are expressly provided, there is no difficulty. But the general principle of law is as I have stated. Now it is proposed to modify the law as regards custom-house bonds executed on behalf of a firm by one of the partners.

As the law stands at present, in order to permit a New York firm to As the law stands at present, in order to permit a New York firm to import any article into the city of New York, every partner must sign the bond individually. One partner cannot sign the name of or bind his copartners unless there is an express power given by the other members of the firm authorizing him to sign their names. This bill proposes to relieve the merchants of New York who are doing business as copartners from this hardship and to allow one partner to sign the bond for the firm. I do not think that this works any hardship. I think it is in the interest of all those who are as copartners engaged in importing. I do not see that it will be any disadvantage.

engaged in importing. I do not see that it will be any disadvantage to the Government; on the contrary it will be rather a convenience.

Mr. LAWRENCE. We throw upon the Government the proof of who the individual members of the partnership are. The fact is that this thing of getting wiser than the common law by statute is a pretty difficult undertaking. I have never seen a statute yet whose provisions were better than those of the common law.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I do not know much about law, but I know something in regard to this question, and I will try to make the House understand it in a few words.

The successors of my firm to-day are notified that a package of dry goods or of hardware has arrived on board ship; the firm we will say consists of five men, and instead of the head of that firm, or any one member of the firm authorized to do so, being called to go and sign the bond for each individual member, each member of that firm, sick or well, must be brought to the custom-house to sign the bond and the sureties must go as many times as the members of the firm in order to get the goods through the custom-house. Now, sir, there is certainly no good reason why any man engaged in commerce should be subjected to an inconvenience of that kind and

Moreover, sir, since the year 1825 until within a brief period, which I will not attempt to state, (my practice does not warrant me in doing it and I have not the facts before me,) what is proposed in the bill reported by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Tucker] has been the practice in New York. I venture to say that there is not a man of clear intellect in this House that can go to the custom-house in New York and stand at the bond-clerk's desk for five minutes of any one day without being convinced that there should be no law against the convenience of merchants such as this bill seeks to obviate. The case on venience of merchants such as this offi seeks to obviate. The case is as clear as any case can possibly be made.

Mr. TUCKER. I think, if gentlemen will give me their attention for a mement, I can relieve this question of any difficulty. The point I think may be made clear by this statement: However it might be as to ordinary contracts, whether there is a partnership formed with a limitation upon the power of the partners as to contracts under seal, it seems to me that, under the power of the Government to lay and collect taxes and to make the laws necessary and proper for the purpose of laying and collecting taxes, there is full power in Congress to provide that any contract, whether sealed or unsealed, which any party shall make in respect to the matter of customs, shall be under the Federal law and controlled exclusively by it. And, therefore, when a contract is made by a member of a firm, who otherwise would be unable to make a sealed contract, yet when that contract is made in reference to business with the Government, each member of the firm must be considered as consenting to the paying of impost duties, and must be regarded as so consenting without regard to a general restriction in partnership.

Mr. HALE. How does the gentleman fix that very matter of con-

Mr. TUCKER. Because it is done for their benefit.

Mr. HALE. But suppose it is in direct contravention of the stipulations of the partnership agreement, upon which the partners rely and under which they live and do business?

Mr. TUCKER. That is my point, that the law of Congress is supreme; and I beg gentlemen to admit that I do acknowledge the supremacy of Federal law. [Laughter.] Within the granted powers it is supreme.

But not to the impairing of obligations.

Mr. TUCKER. I say that the power to lay and collect duties is, if gentlemen choose to have it so, a national power.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That is right.

Mr. TUCKER. And that any man dealing with the Government within the limitation of granted powers is bound by the laws of the Government, any individual contract to the contrary notwithstand-I have no doubt the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] will yield his objections now.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I have no objection to that; it is all right. Mr. TUCKER. That being the case, I apprehend there will be no

Mr. TUCKER. That being the case, I apprehend there will be no further difficulty about this matter.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Virginia will allow me a single word. I had not supposed that there was any disposition to go into a constitutional discussion upon this measure, and certainly I did not desire to inaugurate an argument of that kind myself. I wish to inquire whether the Committee of Ways and Means could not end this question for all time by simply changing the form of the contract and providing that the contract shall not be required to be scaled, which is an absolute superfluity. Then there will be no difficulty whatever under any circumstances in executing these contracts in the ordinary course of business, just as promissory notes are executing these contracts in the ordinary course of business, just as promissory notes are executing these contracts in the ordinary course of business, just as promissory notes are executing these contracts in the ordinary course of business, just as promissory notes are executing these contracts in the ordinary course of business. in the ordinary course of business, just as promissory notes are executed. I name that, because in a State like mine, where we are getting over useless formalities, we have found no difficulty and great facility in the transaction of business by abolishing these seals. I think therefore the more perfect mode would be to do away by statute with the necessity for sealed instruments.

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose that anybody here has any objection to the object sought to be attained by the passage of this bill, but there were certain legal difficulties suggested first by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson] and it seems to me advisable, looking to the point the gentleman seeks to accomplish, that he disembarrass the bill of objections which may in the end paralyze the Government in seeking to enforce its rights.

Mr. SAYLER. I would like the gentleman to tell me how this can embarrass the Government, inasmuch as every member of the firm can bind his firm? I do not understand, as a legal proposition, how it can embarrass the Government.

Mr. TUCKER. I think the House is prepared to vote on this bill, and I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] was a very proper one in its way, but I think with the modifications I have made the bill is in such form that the Government is perfectly safe so far as these custom-house bonds are concerned. I therefore call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

PROCEEDS OF PUBLIC LANDS FOR EDUCATION.

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia. The Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 748) to apply the proceeds of sales of public lands to the education of the people, have instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that the same do pass. As it is a very important bill, I ask that it may be printed in full in the RECORD, in order that every member of the House may have a fair opportunity to read it.

This bill will have to go to the Committee of the Whole House, and I ask that it may be made the special order therein on the Tuesday of week after next, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reports of the Committee on Appropriations excepted.

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia. Of course.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say, with the permission of the gentleman, that I took very great interest in this question in a former Congress, being opposed to anything that contemplates the continued speculative sale of the public lands. I hope that before the House takes action on this bill it will be referred to the Committee on Public

Mr. SAYLER. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia. I have already moved its reference to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole takes precedence of a motion to refer to a standing or special committee.

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia. My request is that the bill be printed in full in the RECORD, and that it be made the special order in Committee of the Whole for two weeks from to-day, and from day to day till disposed of. Mr. KASSON.

Mr. KASSON. I object to its being made a special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole and printing it in the RECORD?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. The bill is as follows:

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the net proceeds of the public lands are hereby forever consecrated and set apart for the education of the people: Provided, That this act shall not have any effect to repeal, impair, or suspend any law now authorizing the pre-emption of public lands or the entry of public lands for homesteads, nor as limiting in any manner the power of Congress to alter or extend the right of homestead upon such lands: And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be held to limit or abridge the power of Congress over the public domain or interfere with granting bounty lands.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause an account to be taken upon the close of each fiscal year, and ascertain the total receipts from the sale or other disposition of the public lands of the United States, including all fees received at the general and district land offices during such year, and the amount of expenditures during said year, incurred or occasioned by the survey, sale, location, entry, or other disposition of such lands, including appropriations for the expenses of the said officers for said year, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of the net cash proceeds from the sale, entry, location, or other disposition of such lands, including such expenses and expenditures.

SEC. 3. That upon the receipt of such certificate the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on or before the 31st day of July of each year, apportion to the several States and Territories, between the ages of five and twenty-one years, the net proceeds of sales of public lands for the previous year: Provided, That after five years one half of said net proceeds, and after ten years the whole of the same, shall be set apart as an educational fund, which said fund shall be invested in the bonds of the United States and Territories, betw benefits of this act, it shall maintain for at least three months in each year a system of free public schools for all the children within its limits between the ages of six and sixteen, and shall, through the proper officer thereof, for the year ending the 30th day of June last preceding such apportionment, make full report of the number of public free schools, the number of teachers employed, the number of school-houses owned and the number of school-houses hired, the total number of children taught during the year, the actual daily attendance, and the actual number of months of the year schools have been maintained in each of the several school districts or divisions of said State, Territory, or District, and the amounts appropriated by the Legislature or otherwise received for the purpose of maintaining a system of free public schools. And if any State or Territory shall misapply, or allow to be misapplied or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fall to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report, as herein provided, through his proper officers, the disposition thereof, such State or Territory, shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof, until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory, and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made; and all apportionments so forfeited and withheld shall be added to, and become part of, the principal of the educational fund hereby created.

Sec. 6. That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to affect in any manner the existing laws and regulations in regard to the adjustment and payment to States of the per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their respective limits as provided in section 3689 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

SALE OF LANDS AT VINCENNES, INDIANA.

Mr. PARSONS. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by Mr. PARSONS. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected the bill (H. R. No. 192) authorizing the sale of certain lands at Vincennes, Indiana, upon which I believe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who desires to move an amendment to the bill.

Mr. PARSONS. I submit that the first question is upon the motion to reconsider.

to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. Upon consultation with gentlemen opposed to the bill, I have prepared an amendment which I think will remedy the evils complained of.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The first thing to be done, before an amendment can be offered, is to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. That motion cannot be made now, the time for reconsideration having passed. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion to recommit was agreed to, upon a division, ayes 91, noes not counted.

ADOLPH VON HAACKE.

Mr. HOSKINS. I am instructed by the Committee on War Claims to report back the bill (H. R. No. 586) for the relief of Adolph von Haacke, and to move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Military

The motion was agreed to.

J. T. MORRIS.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom were referred the claim and accompanying papers of J. T. Morris, have instructed me to report the same back, and move that the committee be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. Anderson was granted leave of absence for one week from to-day on account of important business. Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE. Wednesday, February 16, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BOOTH presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the passage of a law at an early day providing for the transfer of the entire management of Indian affairs from the Department of the Interior to the War Department; which was referred barelinett of the Herital to the War Department, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of James Dalton, of New York, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KELLY presented the petition of M. P. Jones, praying for reimbursement of moneys expended in the survey of public lands in the State of Oregon; which was referred to the Committe on Public Lands.

Mr. WITHERS. I present the petition of Joseph Segar, of Virginia, praying for pay as a United States Senator. This properly belongs to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I presume, but it is calcium, and perhaps had best got a the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Claims, and if they desire further action they can be discharged from its further consideration in order to have it referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I present a petition, signed by General Patterson and other officers who served during the late war, praying for the establishment of a military and marine hospital in Virginia. I desire to have the petition read. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be reported, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Your petitioners respectfully represent that they have been informed by a number of credible physicians that extraordinary medical powers are contained in the waters of the Massanetta Springs, located in the county of Rockingham, in the valley of Virginia. They are described as decidedly restorative in that large class of chronic diseases which entail so much persistent ill-health and disconfort upon the officers and men of armies and navies. They therefore ask that you cause inquiry to be instituted into the merits and qualities of these springs, with a view to establishing a military and a marine hospital there for invalids. If, upon the investigation of this matter, you find that these singular beneficial properties do pertain to these waters, in view of the great benefits and comforts incident to such an infirmary, we feel assured that to furnish it will be both a national pleasure and a national duty.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of Myron H. Tarbox & Co., of Lockport, New York, remonstrating against the extension of the patent of Thomas A. Weston. They recite that this patent has never been established in law; that there are pending litigations, involving the question of its extension, in England and in this country; that the monorous belower to a correction in Conthis country; that the monopoly belongs to a corporation in Connecticut; and that this corporation has largely increased the price of pulley-blocks, although the materials of which they are made are much less in value than formerly; and that very large sums have already been made and profits realized. Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (8. The committee find that this same claim was at one time before the Committee on Indian Affairs, that the bill was reported against, and the report concurred in. Your committee have reached the same conclusion, and ask that this bill be indefinitely postponed.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 260) for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. Thayer, of Washington, District of Columbia, to submit an adverse report thereon. The claim was originally presented in the House of Representatives, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and reported favorably. It came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Claims, and was reported adversely by Judge WRIGHT, recommitted to the Committee on Claims, reconsidered by that com-

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print the memorial of Samuel S. Smoot, asking aid in the construction of the Southern Maryland Railroad, have instructed me to report it back and to move to be discharged from its further consideration. It is not the practice of the Senate to print memorials except in very exceptional cases.

Mr. CONKLING. I am instructed by the same committee to report back with amendments Senate bill No. 32. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas near me [Mr. INGALLS] to its title. It is a bill conferring exclusive jurisdiction over Indian reservations upon the United States courts, and for the punishment of crimes committed by and against Indians. I imagine there is not likely to be opposition to this bill, and at the suggestion of another Senator that such would be the pleasure of the Senate, I ask that it may be considered now.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ALCORN. I rise for a personal explanation. I desire to have a paragraph read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read it. The Chief Clerk read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 8.

**Mashington, February 8.

**A conclave of carpet-baggers was held to-night in the room of the Senate. Spencer and about sixty of his brethren were in council, the purpose of which was to decide on a policy for a better presentation of the bloody shirt and the upholding of Mortonism. Spencer, in behalf of the committee of which he is the leader, reported that he waited upon Chief Justice Waite, with Morey, of Louisiana, and represented to the Judge the necessity of an early and favorable decision on the enforcement act. Spencer related in lugubrious tones his discomiture with the Chief Justice. That gentleman listened to his remarks coldly, and replied, with no evidence of sympathy, that it was not the practice of the supreme bench to discuss decisions before they are rendered, and that, in short, such an appeal from any source was no more or no less than a contempt of court.

Rebuffled at this point the disconsolate carpet baggers waited on the President, and informed him of the situation of things, urging his co-operation. They informed him that telegrams had been received from Kellogg to the effect that one of the judges in Mississippi had been impeached, and would inevitably be deposed; that he expected his own impeachment daily, and that unless the strongest clauses of the enforcement act could be brought to bear the last vestige of power would be torn from the hands of the President's supporters. General Grant promised to lend a hand, but gave no very definite idea as to how it would come. A warm discussion followed on the presentation of these reports. Letters were read from Governor Ames, suggesting a plan for a campaign for the recapture of Mississippi, which met with Senator Alcoms's approval. Alcoms, who has heretofore been bitterly opposed to Ames, now supports that gentleman, and is urging the bloody-shirt policy. policy

Mr. ALCORN. I should not deem it necessary to notice this matter but for a statement that I shall make. This article was published in the Chicago Times and purports to be a communication from the correspondent of that paper at this capital. The extract that I have had read at the desk was published in the Memphis Appeal, which credits the article to the Times. I am placed by it for the first time,

I believe, in the category of a carpet-bagger. I had up to this time escaped at least that imputation. That, however, is a small matter. That to which I desire to direct the attention of the Senate is that I That to which I desire to direct the attention of the Senate is that I am charged with having approached, or having belonged to a conspiracy that approached, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, at the head of the judicial department of this Government, for the purpose of endeavoring to influence his action upon a certain case now pending before that court for its decision. Had I been guilty of this, I should not only be unworthy as a lawyer and deserve to be stricken from the roll, but I should in truth be unworthy of a seat in this body. Whether any such conspiracy or association of gentlemen ever assembled in the Capitol I do not know. I am sure I was not a party to it.

While I am n. I may as well remark upon the latter clause of the While I am up, I may as well remark upon the latter clause of the paragraph, in which it is stated that I am in co-operation with General Ames and that I was in accord before the President with General Ames's suggestion as to the means to be used to recapture the State of Ames's suggestion as to the means to be used to recapture the State of Mississippi, those means being chiefly by the use of the Army, or Federal interposition. I have had no correspondence with Governor Ames for the past five years, and I am not acquainted with his views touching the recapture by the republicans of my State. Governor Ames defeated me for the office of governor in 1873. The leading democrats of that State, the democratic newspapers of that and other States who supported his claims to the office, the paper from which the paragraph is read being one of these, are better entitled to the private views of the governor than I who opposed him can be supposed to be. I will state emphatically that no such interview was held within my knowledge. I have had no meeting upon any such subject nor have I communicated any such ideas as are imputed to me by this correspondent since I have been in Congress. since I have been in Congress.

since I have been in Congress.

My record touching Federal troops is one that those in Mississippi and of the country who desire to know can without trouble ascertain. It cannot be forgotten by the people of that State that in 1869, when a candidate for governor, I refused to canvass the State under the protection of Federal troops. It cannot be forgotten that when I was tendered in 1869 the position of military governor of Mississippi I declined the office upon the ground that I would not consent to rule over the people of my State except by their free and unrestrained wish expressed at the ballot-box. It cannot be forgotten that in 1870, when dissatisfied members of the Legislature of Mississippi appealed to the President for troops in order to suppress insurrection in that State, I protested against that appeal; that I remonstrated with the President against interfering in the civil affairs of the State. My telegrams now of record were so many protests against the policy now telegrams now of record were so many protests against the policy now imputed to me. It cannot be forgotten by the people there that I did protect both life and property in Mississippi while I was governor of that State, and without any interposition upon the part of the Federal Government. It cannot be forgotten that, when I resigned the office of governor in 1871, I left the State in a repose that it had not enjoyed for ten years, and which it has not since that time enjoyed. As to who is responsible for the condition of things as they now exist in Mississippi I may at some subsequent time upon the floor of the Senate explain to the country.

REPORTS OF DEBATES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I rise to offer a concurrent resolution. This is a Mr. ANTHONY. I rise to ofter a concurrent resolution. This is a resolution that passed the Senate substantially at the last session or the session before, and as it relates to the order of business, and should be passed, if at all, at as early a period as possible in the session, I ask that it be printed and lie on the table, giving notice that I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to state briefly the reasons why I think it should be passed. I will ask to do so to-morrow at the close of the morning proceedings.

The resolution was read, as follows:

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate. (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the reports in the Congressional Record shall be an accurate transcript of the proceedings and the debates of the two Houses of Congress, and that no speech shall be published therein which was not spoken in the Senate or in the House of Representatives; and such speeches shall be printed as they were actually delivered, without omission, alteration, or addition, except verbal alterations, made by the author of the speech, and by no other person; and that when speeches are reserved by their authors for correction, they shall be returned to the reporter of the House in which they were delivered within one week, and, if not so returned, they shall then be printed in the Congressional Record from the original notes of the reporter.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2135) relating to the execution of custom-house

A bill (H. R. No. 1440) to enable Charles H. Fondé to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of letters-patent for improvement in dredging-machines;

A bill (H. R. No. 2133) to amend section 10 of the act making apropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending June 30, 1876; and A bill (H. R. No. 2134) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a resolution authorizing the Commissioner of Agriculture to deliver to each Senator and member of the House of Representatives twenty-five copies of the Agricultural Report for 1873, including the number heretofore delivered to members of Congress during the present session.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President

A bill (S. No. 305) to change the location of the consulates at Aix-la-Chapelle and at Omoa and Truxillo; and

A bill (H. R. No. 217) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the Ladies' Monumental Association of Allegheny County, for monumental purposes.

SALE OF TIMBER LANDS.

Mr. KELLY. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 6) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in the Territories of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

mittee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to hear what, in the opinion of the committee reporting it, is to be the effect of this bill.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, I will simply state that this bill is a copy of one that passed the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress. It was then well considered by the House committee and a printed report made upon it. It came to the Senate too late for consideration at the last session. At an early day in this session it was introduced by me, referred to the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, and received a full consideration before that committee at two or three meetings and laws instructed by the term. committee at two or three meetings, and I was instructed by that committee to report it back without amendment and recommend its pas-

I will say further that the object of the bill is to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. For several years he has recommended that some legislation be enacted by Congress to dispose of the timber lands; I mean those lands that are valuable chiefly for their timber and unfit for agricultural purposes. I hope this bill will be well considered by the Senate; because it is the inauguration of a new policy in regard to these timber

It will be perceived that the lands which this bill authorizes to be sold are those chiefly valuable for the timber. It is well known to every one conversant with the disposal of the public lands that the only two modes now for the disposal of them are the pre-emption law and the homestead law; and with respect to the homestead and pre-emption laws, they are for the purpose of enabling settlers to go upon the public lands, reside upon them for a certain length of time, make improvements, cultivate them, and, in short, to make a permanent home upon the land. That is the object of the pre-emption and homestead laws.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from Oregon state why these lands cannot be entered?

Mr. KELLY. The Senator from Wisconsin has inquired of me why these lands cannot be entered under existing law. They can be entered. This bill does not propose to abrogate either the pre-emption or the homestead law, but it allows any person to become a purchaser in the States of California and Oregon and in Washington Territory of a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, without residing upon it, and also in the other Territories of the United States to acquire by the same method a quantity not exceed-

The object of this bill is simply that any person may purchase without going upon the land to reside upon it, because it is unfit for residence, it is unfit for agricultural purposes, and the consequence is now that if any one goes upon the land it is simply for the purpose of residing upon it for a short time, removing the timber, and then abandoning the land. It has been too frequently the case that persons desiring to cut timber on the public lands will take either a presons desiring to cut timber on the public lands will take either a pre-emption or homestead claim, go upon it, cut down and sell the tim-ber, and never pay for or enter the land. The purpose of this bill is to do away with those trespasses upon the public domain, so that persons may acquire a title without residence, and have an interest in the timber lands, and protect them from destruction and protect them from trespass.

It will be seen by reading the bill that any person may acquire title by paying double the minimum price, that is, two dollars and a half an acre, instead of one dollar and a quarter.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator will indulge me, he does not quite understand my inquiry. There are no timber lands that I know of in Wisconsin or any of those States which have been once offered for sale, and in accordance with your laws therefore they cannot be entered now by anybody who wants to buy them at ten shillings. Why cannot these lands be entered in that way?

Mr. KELLY. They never have been offered Mr. KELLY. They never have been offered. The Senator inquires why these lands cannot be entered. I will say the policy of the Government has been not to offer any lands on the Pacific coast, and I presume none have been offered for the last fifteen or twenty years. In Oregon they have never been offered except two or three townships, and I presume the policy of the Government is never to offer any hereafter, but to allow them to remain open for pre-emption and homestead claims only. Now, if the Senator from Wisconsin will examine the bill, he will see that it does not refer to any lands except those in the States of California and Oregon and in the several Territories of the United States.

As I said, the object is twofold. First, that the Government may receive something at least for its timber lands; that the forests may not be cut down and the timber taken away and the Government get nothing at all for it. The Government should receive something for its lands; there is no reason why it should not; and the committee, after careful consideration, thought that many persons, rather than go upon a tract of land as a homestead and reside upon it five years, would prefer to pay two dollars and a half per acre; and in that way it will make an honest business, and people will get the timber honestly, instead of cutting it from the public lands as trespassers.

There is another reason. As I said, many persons owning claims in the vicinity of the timber lands trespass upon them, cut down the timber, and take it for the purposes of fencing and building, removing it from the public lands. The object of this bill is that they may acquire the right to this timber by purchasing the land. Then they will have an interest in protecting the timber, instead of destroying it. It must be manifest to every one who is conversant with the public lands of the United States that, when they are not under the control of any one, but are liable to be trespassed upon by everybody, they will not and cannot be protected as if they were in the hands of individuals who have an interest in the timber and an interest in the

The reason why a distinction is made in the amount allowed to be acquired between the States of California and Oregon and Washington Territory and the other Territories is this: Along the sea-coast in those States and that Territory the lands are very heavily covered with timber, and one hundred and sixty acres is none too much; but in the other Territories the amount is limited to forty acres, because the timber lands are very sparse, very scarce, and it would be allowing one person to acquire too much to permit him to get one hundred and sixty acres there. These lands are generally in gorges and on the mountains—sometimes inaccessible almost; and to allow any one to get one hundred and sixty acres there would take up nearly all the timber land of the vicinity. timber land of the vicinity.

I may say further, that in the mining countries, where it is necessary to have timber for mining purposes to smelt the ores, the timber is removed from the public lands now by any person who may choose to take it. It may be said that they should be punished for their trespasses. That may be, but they never are. In fact it becomes a necessity to have timber to smelt the ores and to conduct mining operations wherever they are carried on; and to say that the timber erations wherever they are carried on; and to say that the timber shall not be taken, is to say that we simply mean to shut down on mining operations forever. It is the policy of the Government not to do that, but to protect the miners, and to give them a right to timber lands, and enable them to use them for legitimate purposes, instead of removing the timber from the lands by trespass.

I think the provisions of the bill are well guarded. It has been the object of the committee, as it was the object of the House committee at the last session, to guard it in every way, and protect the interests of the United States, and I think it has been done. If the measure can be better protected and better guarded, more than it is now, of course the Committee on Public Lands will be glad to see it done.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, if we may believe the arguments that were used by the advocates of the bill that passed yesterday, to repeal the southern homestead act, and those that are offered by the Senator from Oregon this morning, a very large proportion of the in-habitants of the States in which these lands are situated are thieves and engaged in the business of larceny for a livelihood. The great argument that is offered is that they are continually stealing the timber; and we are asked, as a measure of justice to the United States, in order to protect the public domain, to fix some price on these lands, in order that men may be deprived of the temptation to steal the timber from them. Now, sir, I confess that I am not sufficiently acute to understand how, if men are determined to steal the timber from these lands and have the opportunity to do so under existing laws, you are going to prevent them from stealing by putting a price on these lands and compelling them to buy them. The homestead and pre-emption laws are in force in the States of California and Oregon and in Washington Territory. Persons desiring to obtain the timber upon these lands can make a declaratory statement either under the homestead or pre-emption law, and, as these Senators say, strip the timber from the land, commit waste upon it, commit trespass upon it, and then before the time has expired at which they are compelled to make final proof can abandon it, having rendered it thereby unfit for any purpose whatever.

Now, it is proposed by this bill to say that persons shall be allowed to acquire these lands at $2.50 per acre, when the fact is now that they can go on and commit all the waste they desire and steal all the timber there is on the land without paying anything. I hope that the Senator who has charge of this bill will explain in what manner the Treasury of the United States or the value of the public domain is to be protected by the provision that is inserted here.

Again, sir, I am unable to understand upon what theory it is proposed to amend the public land laws of the United States by permitting corporations or associations of persons to acquire title. That seems to me to be a provision that certainly requires explanation. And I also am unable to notice particularly the reasons why these same provisions should not be extended to the other Territories of the In lines 11, 12, and 13 of the first section the bill excludes the inhabitants of all other Territories of the United States from the provisions of this act and limits them to forty acres, while it allows citizens of California and Oregon and of Washington Territory to obtain one hundred and sixty acres. Certainly, as was said in the argument on the bill which was under consideration yesterday, laws ought to be uniform in their operation; and if this is good law for the States of California and Oregon and for Washington Territory, it is certainly good law for all the other Territories of the United States. I trust the bill will not pass, at least without some explanation of these obnoxious features

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, I think this bill should not be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading at present. I have not had an opportunity of examining the bill particularly, and the fact that it is limited to certain States in the United States and contains very important provisions induces me to suppose that the regulations in regard to timber should not be limited to those States, if any provision is to be made. It should be a general provision, I think, if there is any provision of this kind incorporated into the law; but as the bill now stands I wish to propose an amendment to it, if that is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment is in order.

Mr. McMILLAN. In section 2, after the word "himself" in the twentieth line, I propose to insert these words:

Nor has deponent executed any mortgage or other instrument upon said land or any part thereof by or under which, or any proceedings thereunder, the title may be vested in any other person.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I think the friends of the bill have no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota; I certainly have none myself; and if the machinery of the bill can in any way be guarded so that speculators cannot take advantage of this law if we pass it, I shall be very glad to have that done. Nearly the whole bill is taken up with provisions hedging out opportunity for speculators to avail themselves of its provisions to opportunity for speculators to avail themselves of its provisions to acquire large tracts of land under it. One difficulty in the disposal of public land, except under the homestead law, has been that, no matter how cunningly laws might be devised, persons with evil intentions could evade them and acquire too much of the public domain. So far as California is concerned, we have been cursed a great deal in that direction, not so much by the application of the pre-emption law, which, from my observation and all I have learned about it, has been pretty fairly administered in that State; and there have not been pretty fairly administered in that State; and there have not been the charges of fraud, shameful and glaring to heaven, which have oc-curred in Kansas and some other States of the West. In my State the pre-emption law seems to have been honestly administered; persons have applied for forty, eighty, or one hundred and sixty acres, proved up their right under the pre-emption law, paid for their tract, and used it as a home for themselves and their families, not selling it, at any rate, until after the time they had procured the title and the ex-igencies of business required them to divide up their property or to sell it to some other person. But we are negaliarly situated so far as our igencies of business required them to divide up their property or to sell it to some other person. But we are peculiarly situated so far as our timber lands are concerned. Senators are well aware that the Sierras, which are the backbone of the whole coast, and the Coast Range, and the Cascade Range, start in Washington Territory and run all the way down nearly to the Isthmus of Panama, and so far as California and Oregon, and a portion of Washington Territory are concerned they are well defined. These Sierras are from seven to eleven thousand feet high. They are above the line of verdure, where there is frost every month in the year where anything like agriculture is also. every month in the year, where anything like agriculture is absolutely impossible, and where the existence of pines in their luxuriance is a wonder to those who see them, that upon such altitudes, and through such snow-banks, penetrating through the original rock of granite, such forests can grow. But the idea of settlement there is entirely excluded, as any one knows who has observed that region.

These treasures of forests, however, are absolutely necessary to the continued existence of our people as a community on that coast. From that treasure they draw the firewood which they burn, the wood out of which they build their cities or construct their fences, the miners their flumes, or the timbers with which they construct their tunnels; and if the door were absolutely closed by penalties to access to these forests, all these kinds of business would be compelled to cease; if our towns burned down, there would be no means of repairing them, and we build very largely of wood. Of course we could not maintain fences; mining operations would have to stop. In fact, the general industries of the coast would cease, and residence there would be impossible.

Now, there is no honest settlement there under the law. If a man goes there under the pre-emption law and makes the oath required, he necessarily commits perjury. He must satisfy his conscience that he is only observing a form of law. He cannot honestly make the oath that he takes up the land for cultivation, because it is not succeptible of cultivation, and yet he must have timber. We are met with that difficulty that here are these timber lands which the Government provides no means whatever for the disposition of, allows no opportunity to purchase. There is no law on the statute-book which any man can point out whereby that timber can honestly be acquired.

It has been so for twenty-five years in the State of California; and yet our people have been compelled to use the timber. They would be glad to purchase it if they could. I have received representations from thousands of my fellow-citizens, asking for an opportunity to be honest men in this regard; and one reason perhaps which urges them to it is that there are really very severe and cruel penalties on the statute-book, and in rare cases men have been sent to the State prison or heavily fined for pursuing a business that was absolutely necessary These cases would excite public attention, and for the community. even conventions have been held to call the attention of members of Congress to the subject, as did our press very generally, almost without exception, showing the hardships under which we labored because we could not honestly buy the lands, and yet we could not exist there unless we took the timber and unless the Government provided some way in which it could be done.

Under these exigencies we have frequently brought the subject to the attention of Congress. Several years ago, I remember, a bill very similar to this was passed by the House of Representatives. It was again passed under the urgency of the Representatives of the Pacific coast in the last Congress. The Senate up to this time has never given the subject the attention it deserves. The simple proposition of this bill is that lands so situated, valuable for timber only, may be sold in a limited quantity of one hundred and sixty acres—it ought to be three hundred and twenty acres—for two dollars and a half, which is the minimum price; that no person or association shall buy more than one tract; and after Le or it has bought it the right is exhausted. This is hedged around by oaths and papers and documents in every form which careful ingenuity can provide. If any Senator, as the Senator from Minnesota has proposed, can devise language which will still more guard that portion of this bill we should like it to be guarded, because, while I would desire that there be an opportunity for our people honestly to carry on this business, I do not wish this land to be absorbed by speculators. Really, then, the provision of this bill is that persons may buy one hundred and sixty acres for two dollars and a half an acre without the necessity of residence, which would be a mere blind, which would be doing a vain thing, for no man can reside and cultivate at from five to twelve thousand feet above the level of the sea, and that is the altitude to which the mass of this timber belongs.

Mr. HOWE. Why not provide that these lands shall be offered at public sale #

Mr. SARGENT. Because then you give an opportunity to specu-

Mr. HOWE. Any better opportunity than this?

Mr. SARGENT. I think so. This bill simply provides that a person shall exhaust his privilege by a single purchase and that he shall make it for his own use and not for speculation. At public sale a dozen or a hundred persons may be employed to go and buy each a single tract for another.

Mr. HOWE. These limitations will all be avoided entirely, but if they are secure you can put them all to a bill which still requires that the lands shall be offered at public sale.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator then tell me any advantage there Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator then tell me any advantage there will be in offering the land at public sale if all these limitations are put in, instead of allowing individuals to enter it?

Mr. HOWE. This advantage: If the Senator wants a particular tract of land and I want the same tract, the Government will get what the one who wants it the most is willing to pay.

Mr. SARGENT. Then the Senator proposes that the limit shall not be two dollars and a half an acre; and as he would not impose a limit in the other direction, the land might be sold for less than two dollars and a half.

Mr. HOWE. Let that still be the minimum as the bill has fixed it;

Mr. HOWE. Let that still be the infilling as the bill has need it; but if anybody wants to pay more, let him have the opportunity.

Mr. SARGENT. The experience of the Government is unfavorable to the idea the Senator advances. Down to twenty years ago the system of offering lands was supposed to be a judicious one. Twenty years ago it was entirely abandoned, simply because it was found a sure means of playing into the hands of speculators. There has not been any offering of land in that time, though for years thereafter the law remained on the statute-book, simply because it was forced on the attention of the executive department that it was a method on the attention of the executive department that it was a method for fraud, and that the experience of the country under it had been most unhappy.

In my own State the lands which were open to private entry until they were closed by legislation which I proposed myself came from the system of offering lands; and the speculators took advantage of that very system of private entry, which is the correlative of the proposition of the Senator, by entering vast tracts of land at a really nominal price, for that was what it amounted to. So that there are tracts in the fertile valleys of my State owned by single individuals which a man cannot traverse in a day upon a fleet horse. That was the system which the Senator perhaps alluded to; that was the system of private entry which always follows the system of offering lands. I should like to ask the Senator, if you offer at public auction and nobody buys, what is the alternative? Are we to go back to the system of private entry, or be without any statute that will authorize the sale of lands?

Mr. HOWE. Have your bill then, precisely. The only object of offering the lands at public sale is this: That if there is a tract which is worth more than twenty shillings or twenty dollars per acre, as there may be a great many tracts which are desirable, not to one but to a dozen and to a hundred who will crowd about the land office and seek it, there is one way of settling two things: first, what the Government shall get for that particular tract, and second, which of the hundred men shall have it. That is the man who will pay the

Mr. SARGENT. I understand the Senator proposes to retain the limitations there are here on the offering at public sale to private speculation, so that an individual shall buy but a single tract of one hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly, if that be desirable.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly, it that be desirable.

Mr. SARGENT. The result will be that if you make it as a general system of offering these lands at public sale, a single man who wants a tract of one hundred and sixty acres will attend only one sale, and you will soon find you will have all your expense of advertising, all your adjournments from place to place, without any bidders whatever. You would find simply large expenses devolving on the Government of the United States without any sales of land. Furthermore, a man would be little likely to buy, because he would know that by the alternative proposition in a short time he could by waiting get his land simply at the double minimum price. So then you would merely put the Government to extraordinary expense. You very well know how much advertising costs. The advertising of the sale of the navy-yard at Philadelphia the other day cost $18,000. Advertising is one of the most expensive luxuries the Government indulges in. All these enormous expenses would be incurred, and the only offer you would make to bidders would be that they might buy a single tract not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres. It would not be popular like those sales under the system to which I referred before, where a person might buy not merely one hundred and sixty acres, but might buy a township provided he saw fit to bid more than anybody else. You would find a lack of bidders, and you would simply postpone a necessary reform.

As to the adequacy of this price, it seems to me the double minimum is what the Government ought to ask. After the timber is off the land is worth very little. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] by his proposition yesterday proposed that there should be a system of stumpage instead of a sale of the land. The Government ought not to be a proprietor of land in that sense. It should dispose of the land itself. The Senator, I see, assents to my proposition. Now, I believe that while the Government should dispose of its land, it also should dispose of it at a decent price; but it ought not to attempt to wring out of the settler the very last dollar it can possibly squeeze from him. If two dollars and a half an acre on the average is a fair price for the land, let it go for that. It seems to me, from my knowledge of the subject, that that is a decent price for the sale of these timber lands. The timber on them is pine timber, not particularly valuable for any purpose except the most ordinary kinds of building. It is not ornamental. It is a very ordinary species of wood. The price which is fixed by this bill seems to me as much as any man could profitably buy it for. If, however, there might be a tract here and there which might be worth $5 an acre, the additional amount which the Government might get would not compensate for the expensive machinery the Senator would put afloat. But I rose simply to say that along the sierras there is an exceptional case, on account of the great altitude and the sterility of the land, that requires exceptional legislation. I should like to remark, in reference to the criticism of the Senator from Kansas, that I am not sure but he may be right. I was not aware, until I saw this bill reported, that the amount of land allowed to be entered in the other Territories than Washington was cut down to forty acres. Perhaps it ought to be one hundred and sixty. It seems to me one hundred and sixty acres is little enough; but I defer to the committee in that

The limitation against associations, corporations, or individuals buying more than one hundred and sixty acres is made to apply to each, and is necessary, because sometimes an association may own a saw-mill; and of course you must allow the man who buys the land machinery in order to cut his timber up into lumber.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, in answer to the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin, I beg leave to read from the last report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. He gives in it a quotation from his report of the previous year, wherein he strongly recommends Congress to pass some act to dispose of these public lands; and referring to the matter suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, he

It is true that the law provides that in the discretion of the President this class of lands may be proclaimed and sold at public outery to the highest bidder, but the experience of this Office shows this method to be entirely ineffectual; for the reasons, first, that under the ordinary system of surveys the "field-notes" cannot disclose, with any degree of accuracy, which are pine lands and which are not; and, second, that there is little room for doubt that combinations are formed among purchasers at Government public sales, whereby prices are kept down to a merely nominal figure. The usual result is, therefore, the Government receives the minimum price of the lands, less the large expense of three months' advertising required by law. Another and greater evil results from such public sales under existing laws. This Office having, as I have before stated, no reliable means of distinguishing pine lands, it is reduced to the necessity of including in the proclamation all lands supposed to contain pine. It results that only such small proportion of the tracts proclaimed as are known to the purchasers to contain pine are sold, while the great mass of them, receiving no bid, remain with the Government as "offered lands," subject thenceforth to private cash purchase without settlement, and become the easy prey of non-resident speculators, thus defeating the now well established and beneficent policy of the Government in that regard. The remarks here made apply as well to the "fir lands" of the Pacific as to the pine lands east of the Rocky Mountains, and are indeed of more importance as bearing on the question of the future disposals of "fir land," since the quantity of "pine lands" remaining unsurveyed and unsold is now comparatively limited. Under this state of facts, I would urgently recommend the passage of a law providing, &c.

I entirely agree with what has been said by the Senator from Cali-I entirely agree with what has been said by the Senator from California, that the expenses of advertising would be only a burden to the Government without any adequate good resulting therefrom. That has been the result, as stated by the Commissioner, of offering these lands at public sale. Combinations of persons attend the sales. And again, as he states, but few persons will know from the public advertisements what are fir lands and what are not, unless they actually go upon the ground and examine for themselves, which is rarely done, so that it is mere guess-work when persons go to a sale of public lands whether they buy a valuable tract of land. Inasmuch as this policy of offering the public lands for sale has been discontinued for twenty years, and as the Commissioner is indisposed to revive it, as it has not been done, and probably will not be done, for the reasons stated here, we of course are only left to this mode of acquiring the lands, or else taking them as homestead or pre-emption claims by making the affi-davit that they are intended for the purposes of cultivation, when in truth they are not. I think the reasons adduced by the Commissioner in favor of the proposed policy are good and unanswerable. '
In his communication to the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress, when this very bill, or one word for word like it, was under consideration, he gave his reasons in support of it and why the bill should be passed. I do not care to take up time by reading his communication unless it is called for; but it is sufficient for me to say that he recommended a bill of this kind at the last session of Congress, and I have no doubt he would recommend the passage of this bill now.

The Senator from Kansas has made objection to the clause allowing any "person, corporation, or association of persons" to acquire these lands. I do not think that there is any objection to that for this reason: In the Territories where mining operations are carried on they are almost entirely conducted by corporations or associa-tions. Very few persons are engaged in mining operations—I mean in quartz mining or in fluming operations—in their individual capacity. The business is altogether carried on by corporations or associations. Hence it would be wrong, in my judgment, to confine the disposal of these lands to individuals when corporations are desiring them and when they are as necessary for their use as for individual purposes. I think it would be wrong to limit the bill in that way.

Now a word in regard to the forty-acre provision for the Territories. The bill was originally introduced into the House allowing any person to acquire title to lands not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres, but it was considered advisable to limit it to one hundred and sixty acres in the States of California and Oregon and Washington that it would be giving to any one individual too much of the timber lands, which are so scarce in the Territories, if we allowed more. It would be giving to him an undue proportion of the timber lands. It would be wrong; it would be creating a monopoly of them. Every one who has crossed the plains knows that the timber lands are ex-ceedingly scarce in the Territories, and they are only upon the mountain tops or in the deep mountain gorges that are almost inaccessible for purposes of agriculture and wholly unfit for agriculturists to reside upon. If a person could take a whole clump of timber situated in one of these mountain gorges he would get all there was and could dispose of the timber to his neighbors at exorbitant rates. Hence the Delegates from the Territories insisted that so far as the Territories outside of Washington were concerned no individual should be permitted to acquire more than forty acres of timber land, and I think it is just and right that it should be so. If the timber lands were more abundant in the Territories, I would say it would be right and proper that individuals should have the same rights there as where the timber is abundant, as in California and Oregon and in Washington Territory. This is the explanation of the reason why this distinction It was made after due and full consideration, after consultation with the Delegates, and consultation with the members of the House from the different States named in the bill.

It has been asked, if this be a good bill, why not extend it to all the States, as well those east of the Rocky Mountains as those west? As I said before, this is a new policy about to be inaugurated in respect to the timber lands; it has been approached cautiously. If it is desired by gentlemen in whose States timber lands exist to include them, I have no doubt they can have their States inserted here if they choose; but so far as we could discover they were not prepared for it, at least did not desire that it should be made applicable to their States. If it shall be deemed necessary it can be extended hereafter. It is experimental as it is, and perhaps it would be well enough to confine it to those States mentioned in the bill, and, if it works as well as we think it will, no doubt it will be extended hereafter to every State of the Union where timber lands exist. This is the reason the committee have confined it to the States named, because on account of the necessities of the case we are called upon to do something in regard to the timber lands there. It is much more necessary that action should be taken with regard to these States than the others, where the timber lands have been nearly all disposed of.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, the Committee on Public Lands is of this question, that it should be fully considered by this body. The question is one that had excited a good deal of solicitude in the public mind. Year after year, since I have been in this body, in some shape or other, the question has been recurring, so that at last the Commit-tee on Public Lands felt that they ought to take some step toward the settlement of the question of the disposition of the timber lands of the United States. The bill has received ample consideration, if I may say so, in the other House of Congress at a previous session. did receive pretty full consideration before our committee again this winter. Questions of expediency, questions of policy, questions of propriety in connection with the subject, as well as the question of legal rights, were over and over, again and again, considered. The public sentiment of the country, as the Senator from Massachusetts said yesterday, demands that something shall be done to preserve the timber lands of the United States. Do we intend to preserve them or timber lands of the United States. Do we intend to preserve them or let them go to waste? They are going to waste and have been going to waste for about six thousand years, and they are going to waste while we are talking about them; and yet every inquiring mind is ready with the suggestion "Why is not something done to preserve the timber lands of the United States?" So this committee have presented this bill. It does not cover all the States of the Union; it is not general in its application. It is general in its provision as to the Territories to which it applies; but as an experimental measure it does not apply to the whole country. It is limited confined to two does not apply to the whole country. It is limited, confined to two States on the Pacific Coast and the Territory of Washington, and to the other Territories of the United States.

How shall we go about preserving the timber lands of the United States? That is a very difficult question. One gentleman says the Committee on Public Lands are going to turn the timber lands over to the speculators, going to turn them over to monopolies; you are going to let the lands be stripped of the timber and carried off to market without any tax upon it or any revenue to the Government from it. You may ask forty questions about it in half an hour as to what is going to be done about it. In the mean time, I repeat again, what is going to be done about it. In the mean time, I repeat again, the timber lands of the country are perpetually being stripped of the timber. The fires are running over them every year and burning down more trees than are sawed into lumber. Whose business is it to watch them? It is not my business, Mr. President; it is not the business of this honorable body to do it; nor is it the business of our honorable constituency. Nobody watches them. The timber grows upon the mountains as free as the water runs down the mountainupon the mountains as free as the water runs down the mountainside; and as the thirsty traveler will stop to slake his thirst in that mountain stream as the free gift of God to man, so will he, whenever his convenience requires it, take the tree the same as the water. The trees are growing spontaneously upon the earth. We claim that they are our property. We may just as well claim the water as the timber, because within the confines of our territorial jurisdiction there the timber is growing upon the mountains, and the plains all belong to the people of the United States, but to no one of the people in particular. So that even the discret and prudent Senator from Masse. ticular. So that even the discreet and prudent Senator from Massa-chusetts, who has at heart as much as I or your honor the preserva-tion of the timber lands of the United States, I venture to say if he were traveling across the western plains and came at night alongside of a log or a handsome grove, would not stop long to consider who had the title to it, especially if hunger and cold were pinching on both sides at the same time. He would build his fire, as all discreet and judicious pioneers do, and he would take Uncle Sam's timber and make a rousing fire, and then in the morning he would move away and leave the fire to take care of itself.

That is the way in which the public timber lands are preserved; that is the way they have been, and the way they are and will be preserved. One theory of this bill is this—of course it is a theory preserved. One theory of this bill is this—of course it is a theory that rests merely in reason or rather in suggestion; I do not know how it may strike Senators, nor do I know how it will strike the friends of timber culture and of the preservation of the national forests throughout the country; but the committee argued in this way: If we can get individuals to go along the mountain-sides, along the ravines, along the gorges, along the border of civilization, along the border of agricultural lands—if we can induce citizens to go and enter forty acres, eighty acres, or even one hundred and sixty acres of this timber land, and pay the Government $2.50 an acre for it, here and there, making their claims in different localities through a forest on a given belt of timber, and could get them to make those locations or entries, or purchases rather, there would then be established a cordon of sentinels about that belt or grove of timber that would look after its preservation. If a man owns one hundred and sixty acres of timits preservation. If a man owns one hundred and sixty acres of timber land or a half dozen men in a township own that quantity, will not each more naturally look to keeping the fire out of that belt of timber than if he owned none at all? Take the men along the mountain-side.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend from Illinois, who is an expert in all the ways of pioneer life, what difficulty a pioneer will have in selling timber fifty miles away under this bill, or contracting to sell the timber to a large corporation? Can he not do it under the operations of this bill?

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask what there is in this bill that will prevent one of these pioneers who enters on the land and pays two and a half !

dollars an acre from contracting with a corporation, before he enters on the land, to sell it all the pine timber upon it, and getting from the corporation money, and with that money, and under that contract, taking the title in his own name, the land being worthless when the timber is stripped off?

Mr. OGLESBY. I will say to the Senator that when the title is vested in the purchaser, whatever his motive may have been in purchasing the land, he can of course sell the timber to a railroad cor-

Mr. SHERMAN. I speak of it before that time. Suppose that I, being one of those pioneers, should go out on the public lands and make a contract beforehand with a corporation that after I get title to the land, or as soon as I get title, I will give them a full and indisputable right to all the timber growing on the land, and borrow money of the corporation for the purpose of getting the title, I could hon-estly take every oath that is prescribed here. Mr. OGLESBY. I cannot see what object the corporation would have in making such an agreement with a citizen, when that corpora-tion can go and get the timber without paying him a dollar or a cent for it as things are now.

Mr. SHERMAN. We all know very well, those who have dwelt in Mr. SHERMAN. We all know very well, those who have dwelt in pine woods, like my friend from Maine, [Mr. Hamlin,] that pine is more valuable to a large company to manufacture lumber than it is to any citizen, and a tract of one hundred and sixty acres of land is of no account to a person manufacturing lumber. One hundred acres would be exhausted by a good saw-mill in six months or a year, at the outside. Therefore, this land, when it is opened to purchase, will be acquired by large corporations, who will monopolize the whole of the timber land in that region of country under the operation of this bill because they can employ a hundred men to go and make this bill, because they can employ a hundred men to go and make these entries and acquire title in their own respective names, and buy the timber without violating a single clause or word of this bill.

Mr. OGLESBY. If the honorable Senator has concluded his remarks,

I will go on. I do not see that he gets rid of the suggestion I made a moment ago. What is the use, where is the sense of a corporation entering into an agreement with private individuals to enter these pine lands at $2.50 an acre for the purpose of getting the pine from the individual after the entry is made? Where is the sense or the necessity of a corporation doing that when they can go upon the lands to-day and get the timber without paying anybody a cent? There is no restriction upon them if they are determined to take it, as they do now take it, and take it without compensation. But if the Senator from Ohio wants to guard that point, I know that I am authorized to say for the Committee on Public Lands that they will be glad to have any defense thrown around the system that can possibly be contrived in any sensible and reasonable spirit.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me a moment? Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me a moment? I should like to show the chairman of the committee that the committee did endeavor to guard it, and my impression is that the bill does guard it; or, if it does not, I certainly concur in the suggestion that it should be made to do it. The affidavit which the enterer is required to make says, among other things, "That he does not apply to purchase the same on speculation, but in good faith to appropriate it to his own exclusive use and benefit and not for sale."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is, the title.
Mr. SARGENT. No, it does not say anything about its title up to this time. It is for his own exclusive use and property, and not for speculation. The Senator has described a speculation of a corporation: but further:

And that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person or persons whatsoever, by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure, in whole or in part, to the benefit of any person except himself.

That is to say, there are two things: in the first place, no speculation whatever moves him in this matter and, in the next place, the title is entirely for his own use. But if the Senator is not satisfied with that language, I ask him, for the sake of the people of my own State, to propose an amendment which will cover them; I think this does.

Mr. OGLESBY. I was submitting, Mr. President, general considerations in regard to the policy of this bill; I had not yet come to the details of the bill at all. I only wished to direct the attention of the Senate to this subject now. I say again that it has been a complaint here, year in and year out, that no policy has been adopted in regard to the timber lands of the United States. The Committee on Public Lands have essayed at last in that direction one measure, one step. We present it as the best that suggests itself to our minds. We believe that the sale of the timber lands in the States and in the Territories mentioned in this bill where the normalizion is snarse where tories mentioned in this bill, where the population is sparse, where the country is mountainous and rugged, where they are remote from commerce, remote from densely-populated communities, is the best possible measure that can be devised to protect the magnificent growth of timber on the mountains of the Pacific slope. They are going to decay, going to destruction. No man watches them; no community takes care of them. The Government receives no return from them.

One gentleman asks, why not let the homestead men settle upon them? Certainly we should be very glad indeed to have them do so; but this bill provides that the timber lands to be sold must be of that kind which are not agricultural, or which are noted chiefly for their timber. The purchaser must make affidavit to that fact before he can purchase a tract. It is not mineral land; it is useful for nothing except for timber, or chiefly for timber. Timber is growing in great abundance on the Pacific slope; and we think that to induce the people of those States and Territories to go to the land office, and after pursuing the carefully guarded course provided in this bill, after due application after public paties of the supplication of the supplication. application, after public notice, after an affidavit that sets out in full everything of any possible interest so far as national or individual rights are concerned, to enter tracts of one hundred and sixty acres rights are concerned, to enter tracts of one hundred and sixty acres will be good policy. We have guarded the bill as well as our suggestions would enable us to guard it; but it is open still for any such amendments as may be offered here. We have thought it the best possible system to present now. Let it be tried for a series of years, and see what the future will develop. If it shall prove to be in its results good; if the timber shall not be taken up by the purchaser, the timber that will be control of the Covernment will be results good; if the timber shall not be taken up by the purchaser, the timber that will remain under the control of the Government will be measurably protected from fire by those persons who will make entries here and there through the forests, along the railroads, along the ravines, along the margin of civilization, very well. If we can get them to make purchases, to take possession of this timber land, we believe, I repeat, that it will do more to keep fires out of the forests that prove so destructive in those mountain regions; that it will do more regard that if the Government were to explain an entry of one more good than if the Government were to employ an army of one hundred thousand paid agents to-day to travel over the timber lands to protect them.

Is Congress ready to-day to make appropriations of money to protect the timber lands of the United States? Suppose a bill were introduced here now authorizing the appointment of timber commissioners or agents, under the direction and control of the Secretary of the Interior, to travel over the Western States and Territories and the Interior, to travel over the Western States and Territories and plains to take possession of and guard and protect this timber that lies so near our hearts. That bill would meet with no sort of recognition here. It would be an expense and a drain on the Treasury. If we are not prepared as a deliberative body to devise the means to protect these timber lands, let us quit talking on the subject entirely, let us stop debating about the matter. Let us cease the controversy about the timber lands of the Republic, or else present some such measure as this that will induce men along these settlements to take up the timber lands.

The honorable Senator from Ohio suggests that these pine lands are the honorable senator from only suggests that these pine lands are chiefly profitable for manufacturing purposes. Does he not know that every farmer who has one hundred and sixty or three hundred and twenty acres of prairie land would be very glad to have forty or eighty acres of timber land to go as an accompaniment with his prairie, though it might be three, five, or ten miles away? The universal practice in my own State, where the prairie lies six, eight, ten, and twelve miles from a body of timber land, is that the occupants of the prairie are glad to have timber land to be preserved and perpetuated with the prairie or with the land under cultivation.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask him whether this bill would be applicable to such lands? The bill is only applicable to lands that are unfit for cultivation. Mr. OGLESBY. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. Belts of timber scattered through a prairie country, it seems to me, would be very rare. It would be a rare case indeed where you would find a belt of timber running through a prairie where the land on which the timber grew would not be fit for culti-

Mr. OGLESBY. That may be true when you come down into the plains this side of Cheyenne, when you get off the mesa lands, when you get off the dry, arid, desert land, when you come this side of the one hundredth meridian, or when you come this side of the ninety-seventh meridian line. It may be true there that the largest bodies of land will be the growth of highly productive bottoms, soils along the never we margine of streams. the narrow margins of streams.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator was illustrating his position by a reference to his own State of Illinois.

Mr. OGLESBY. The Senator did not understand me. I was illustrating this point, that the people in California and Oregon and Washington Territory who have agricultural possessions would be very glad to go into the timber region and make entries of timber land to go on with their agricultural possessions, losing sight of the distance be-tween the timber and the arable land. Of course if they were adjoin-ing together, so much the better. But in our own State farmers frequently have to go five, ten, fifteen, and sometimes twenty miles, as in one instance I have in my mind, to bring the timber necessary for the support of the prairie lands under one ownership. It helps the sale of prairie lands immensely. So we believe in presenting this bill here that farmers will be found, if not farmers who are occupy-ing these States and Territories now farmers who will come in hereing these States and Territories now farmers who will come in hereafter taking this public agricultural land, who will go into the foot of the mountains, will go along these gorges, will go into the timber belts, and make selections and pay for them and get the title to them that it may go along as a part of their arable and cultivable land. I think it will be so considered, Indeed, if this class of people are not the ones to take this timber land, we have no hope that any very great amount of it will ever be disposed of under this bill. What we desire is, putting this land at a reasonable price—two dollars and a half an acre, or what the friends of the bill living in that region more particularly than myself desire—is to interest their neonle in these lands. ticularly than myself desire—is to interest their people in these lands by private ownership, so as to induce them to stand as sentinels to watch the belts of timber from that destruction which comes of fire watch the beits of timber from that destruction which comes of fire and waste. Now nobody does it; nobody will do it. It is useless and senseless to talk about it. None of us here will do it. Why talk about expecting other people to do it?

The only way to protect the timber lands of the United States is to put them in possession or occupancy of men who will individually look after them, just as we turned over the great and exhaustless mineral regions to the occupancy of the men who would seek the placers. look after them, just as we turned over the great and exhaustless mineral regions to the occupancy of the men who would seek the placers and develop the mineral wealth. And a wise and humane and liberal policy it was, that the wealth of the Republic buried in the earth might be brought up and applied to all the useful purposes of life, and the Government has immensely benefited and profited by it.

Here are these timber lands standing almost in the same list with the mineral lands and with the free water that runs down the mountain-side. We want these timber lands protected. We want some-body that will take an interest in them. I say this Congress will never pass a bill to pay men to watch and preserve them. Congress never intends to do any such thing. We expect somebody else to do it. Then let us make it an object for somebody else to do it. Let us invite people to go and enter these lands under carefully guarded provisions, paying two dollars and a half an acre for them; let them get the custody and control of them, and they will preserve that timber very much more largely than the great general moving multitude will ever do. That is my opinion, and the opinion of this committee.

Why do we fix the price of the land at two dollars and a half an acre? Look at California to-day, or particularly look at Oregon. Under republican administration, under democratic administration, the State of Oregon—of course she has good land; well selected, chosen lands—offers her public lands in the market at two dollars or two dollars and a half an acre. Those people live there upon the ground; those people mingle in that community; they live right where this timber grows. They know its value better than the Committee on Public Lands of the United States Senate can know it. The State of Oregon fixed the price of its public lands at two dollars or two dollars and a half an acre. So, guided by that light, guided by that direction, we thought it would be better to fix the price rather than embark in that old experiment exploded twenty years ago of advertising them and offering them at public sale here and there all over the country to the highest bidder. The trouble about that is the over the country to the highest bidder. The trouble about that is the highest bidder never comes; you cannot find the highest bidder; he is one of the most indefinite subjects you ever went in search of; he is the hardest fellow to get an introduction to that I ever undertook to form the acquaintance of. The highest bidder does not live. He is not to be found. Now, put this land where the people in those States and the Territory of Washington can be induced to make purchases, and I believe me sensible star will have been taken in the chases, and I believe one sensible step will have been taken in the right direction.

The Senator from Kansas very naturally inquired why it was that we limited the amount to forty acres in the other Territories. The Senator from Oregon has substantially answered that. The reason that induced us to do it was that we thought it would be accepted as a favor by the other Territories. Get this side of the Rocky Mountains, or get on the high plateaus or table-lands of the great interior basin between the Nevada and the Rocky Mountain range, and the country is but sparsely wooded; there are but small bodies of timber to be found. Sometimes high up on the mountains, away up beyond the reach of man almost, large bodies of very excellent timber will be found. But we thought it would be better in those Territories to limit the amount to forty acres, as the quantity is much less. It is true that it is not in desirable locations; it is so situated as not to be convenient for farming uses, and large portions of it, especially on the mesa lands, are adjoining to lands that never will be irrigated or cultivated at all, and in regard to which lands, just as surely as we live, another policy before long must be inaugurated. The survey of those desert lands under the old system of dividing them out into one-hundred-and-sixty-acre tracts to occupants or purchasers will not pracdred-and-sixty-acre tracts to occupants or purchasers will not practically answer for the future. No man wants to go on these desert lands, for they cannot be irrigated. Nature does not furnish the necessary supply of water. They will not be taken up under our old system, which applied to nothing but agricultural lands. In all probability in a short time we shall have to substitute another system altogether different from this with these wild, desert, and unirrigable lands.

But coming back to this timber proposition: The committee I know are perfectly willing that any amendments or any suggestion made by Senators here shall be put upon this bill. It is not introduced in the interest of monopolies, corporations, or combinations of wealthy men. That is not the purpose of the bill. The men who stand behind it are not actuated by such sentiments. The object of the bill is to bring this land within the reach of that great moving class of western citizens who may be induced to take it, and to that extent to preserve it, not only for the present uses required for farming purposes and the purpose of commerce, but to preserve it for that future generation of which we heard yesterday.

Now, then, in brief this is the bill. It is an effort to start a new system as applied to these States and Territories. It is true it contemplates parting with the title of the land from the Government. We go upon the theory that to make it effective the title to the land must pass out of the Government. If you want to protect the timber land the title must pass into the hands of the citizen. That is our theory about it that in the custody of the Government this destruction will never cease. Saw-mills will be placed everywhere just as fire rages unrestricted and undisturbed everywhere. The timber will be hewn down and sawed up and shipped off. It will be wasted in every direction and by every imaginable and possible means. We have at heart the cultivation and preservation of this timber, so far have at heart the cultivation and preservation of this timber, so far as the Committee on Public Lands are supposed to have any heart on that subject. It especially comes under our province. We are driven as a committee to do something about it. We cannot sit here idly any longer. We have presented this system to the Senate and Congress as the best our genius has prompted us to offer. If it can be improved, we shall be very thankful to the Senate for improving it. But do not belittle and do not fritter it all away; do not talk it out of countenance by all kinds of free and easy generalities; do not worry it to death by ceaseless and idle suggestions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am disposed to regard this bill with a good deal of favor, and especially after the excellent speech made by my friend from Illinois. I look upon this bill rather in the light of a revenue measure than in any other aspect. I suppose that by the operations of the bill we shall get some revenue from the public lands in these States, and in no other way. It is manifest that the timber in these States, and in no other way. It is manifest that the timber is rapidly disappearing, the Government of the United States gets no benefit from it, and that the Government now receives not even enough to pay for the expenses of keeping up the land system, because under the homestead and pre-emption laws we get nothing, and the land is not cultivated at all. The operation of this bill, however, is to secure to the Government of the United States two dollars and a half an acre for the timber lands in these localities, and to that extent and with that view only it is a benefit to the Government of the United States. But whether it will inure to the benefit of the people of that region of country I very much doubt. of that region of country I very much doubt.

The honorable Senator from Illinois says that if private persons owned this property it would be protected from fire. All experience shows exactly the contrary. There are Senators here who represent timber countries who know that the more settlements are extended through timber lands the more they are subject to fire. The State of Michigan was the most magnificent pine forest probably in this continent, unless we may perhaps except some portions of Oregon or California; and the State of Michigan was free from ravages by fire until the timber land was largely settled and occupied by cabins and distant and scattered settlements throughout the timber country, when fires appeared and began to be destructive, and in one single year destroyed millions upon millions of dollars of public and private property. It is the settlement in a region of timber country that destroys the country by fire. That land in the peninsula of Michigan had existed for a thousand years beautifully timbered, and was not destroyed by the fire lit by a pioneer or lit by a transient traveler or by a surveyor going his rounds through the country. Such lires were easily extinguished; but when there were fires in every cabin scattered all over the country they began to spread and destroyed vast regions. When saw-mills were established, then the fires began to rage and destroy all the timber in the country; and I assure my honorable friend from Illinois that, while his measure may be a wise revenue measure, it will not protect the forests of Oregon and California from ravages by fire; nor will it protect them from the speculator, against whom my friend seems to have some ill-will. A speculator can ride through this bill with a coach and four without any difficulty. A speculator can organize a system under the terms of this bill by the timber land was largely settled and occupied by cabins and dis-A speculator can organize a system under the terms of this bill by which he could buy for a corporation every quarter section of land in that timber country that he desired to purchase. How? He could send its agents all through this timber land to select favored quarter sent its agents an intoight this timber land to select havored quarter sections; each agent would go and make the affidavit prescribed by this bill, and even before he started on his journey he would make a contract with the corporation or with a lumber company to sell the lumber growing upon that land. He could make the oath without even swearing falsely. Now no man can gain possession of a quarter section in this timber country except by swearing falsely.

This bill is confined entirely to land unfit for cultivation, timber land, not now offered for sale, and no man has the legal right to go and, not now offered for sale, and no man has the legal right to go upon that land unless he swears that he goes to occupy it and to cultivate it for a farm, to make upon it a home. We know when an affidavit is made in regard to any portion of this timber land that it is a false affidavit, because Senators all concur that no one goes upon this timber land, in the high altitude of five thousand feet or upward, with a view to make it a home, because it is unfit for cultivation, and it does not come within the limits of this bill unless it is unfit for cultivation. If this land is opened for settlement under the provisions of this bill, a man could very easily say that he would not sell the title of the land, the ownership of the land, the fee of the land, or any other term we may use, and yet he may make a contract to cut and sell the stumpage, I believe they call it in a timber country, the growing timber on the land; or he may give a lease of the land for ten years. That would be sufficient for the adventurous proprietor of a saw-mill to cut every stick of timber upon it and thus evade the provisions of the law.

I do not regard all these provisions intended to hamper and cripple the right to sell what a man buys as worth the paper on which they are written. If the Government of the United States mean to sell this land, let them sell it for the most they can get for it. If they mean to preserve it intact as a vast forest useful not only for timber, but useful for its effect upon the climate of the country, then they ought to preserve it untouched. If they sell it, let them sell it, but do not let them sell it with the idea that they can prevent peobut do not let them sen it with the idea that they can prevent peo-ple cutting down the timber on it or selling the timber on it, or that they can prevent the man who has paid $2.50 an acre from selling the timber or doing what he pleases with it. All these provisions looking to that end are simply illusory; they are deceptive. They may lead some persons to vote for this bill who would not do so otherwise. I some persons to vote for this bill who would not do so otherwise. I do not think the bill ought to have any of these provisions in it. If the Government sell this land, let them sell it for all that it is worth. Let them give the title, the right of possession, the right of ownership, and no restriction whatever which you can put upon the settler or purchaser of the land at $2.50 an acre will prevent him from using it in the way he thinks most profitable for himself, or will prevent the owner of a saw-mill from buying the timber. The public land in a lumber country is of no value unless it can be held in large tracts. We know well enough that if a man owns only one hundred and sixty We know well enough that if a man owns only one hundred and sixty acres of forest land in Oregon or California he cannot make timber enough to build a small cabin unless he has a saw-mill. A good saw-mill, such as any Yankee can build nowadays, would ent all the timber on one hundred and sixty acres of land in six months. The oldber on one hundred and sixty acres of land in six months. The old-fashioned saw-mills which cut a few logs a day are among the myths of the past. The saw-mill now devours a forest, and it requires thousands of acres of land to keep one of these great gang-mills running for a year or two. Therefore, if this land is to be opened so as to enable the forest to be utilized for lumber, as a matter of course it will get into the hands of corporations and great companies, who will devour the forest for lumber and cut a thousand acres probably in a single year. single year.

I think, therefore, that if we are to pass this bill, (and I am not sure but that it ought to be passed—I rather think it ought,) the better way is to strike off all these provisions which hold out the deceptive idea that the land is to be protected from fire, from sale, and let this public land stand, like all other public land, open to entry at a fixed price of $2.50 an acre, to be sold to whoever will advance the money to pay for it, to any corporation or any person; because that is the effect of it at any rate.

I am told now by Senators around me, and I violate no secrecy in mentioning it, that under the present system of affairs a man goes and makes an entry there by a false oath, and at once sells the timber. In that way a few men may go on a broad pine forest in Oregon and get a kind of pre-emption or homestead claim, and then sell at once to some owner of a saw-mill. Thus the timber is taken off; the Government gets no revenue from it; the law is violated, and their oaths are violated. I see no reason why we should not throw this land open to public entry. Sell it for as much as you will.

The proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin to sell it at public sale I do not believe in, simply because I know from practical observation that in Ohio and some of the Western States the difference between the minimum price of lands at public sale and the price for which they were sold never yet paid the cost of advertising in the last thirty years. Those sales were very common formerly, and those of us who have lived and been raised in the Western States know very well that when the sale comes sometimes a few tracts may be bid at three or four cents an aere more than the minimum price, but as a general rule there is a combination which prevents any advance whatever above the legal rate. It is more than a man's life is worth to go among a hundred or two hundred rough, hardy, brave men, I will say, to bid against them and try to compel them to pay one or two cents an acre more than the law allows. They combine against it. Indeed, I believe that even in Ohio thirty years ago a man's life would have been in danger who would have attempted to get a piece of land at a forced sale of this kind when some other person living in that neighborhood thought he had a right to it, although he had no more right to it than any other man in the United States of America. Therefore it is utterly idle to attempt to sell land at public sale by the Government unless it is a single tract of land in a particular locality, where there may be an opportunity to bid and where you cannot make a combination. It is utterly idle to sell any other land at public sale. When you offer a whole district of country of public land for sale and read over the description of each section and quarter section, and invite a bid of one cent an acre more than a dollar and a quarter, you may endanger your life by bidding the one cent, or two cents, or three cents, or four cents, and nothing is accomplished. The result is either that those who have an alleged claim by a kind of informal pre-emption or sight of the land get the land at just about the Government price, or at a very little more, one, two, or three cents an acre more. Therefore any attempt to sell these lands at public sale involves the Government of the United States in more expense than the sum we probably would secure in any case whatever.

I am in favor of the general idea that we had better sell these lands just like any other proprietor would sell them. Sell them for the most we can get. Put upon them a fair minimum price. If $2.50 is not enough, put more; get all the money we can from the sale of the land; but let us not deceive ourselves with the idea that we are selling to people who are going to live on this land, to a man who is going to hold one hundred and sixty acres of timber land in the wilderness, that he promises he will not sell, that he swears he will not sell. We all know that is perfectly illusory; that he will get around that oath just as sure as fate; and we simply make him commit perjury merely because we are afraid we are willing to sell the public land to any-body who comes and offers us our price for it. I would rather do it openly; strip this bill of all these restrictions upon the sale of the land and sell it openly and above board: first, on the ground that we openly; strip this bill of all these restrictions upon the sale of the land and sell it openly and above board: first, on the ground that we cannot preserve it from fires or from depredations; second, that we do not want to be cheated under color of pre-emption or homestead by a false oath; and, third, because we want to get as much revenue as we can. At the same time, put these lands into the hands of private persons, corporations, individuals, settlers, or anybody else who will pay $2.50 an acre for them.

Mr. HOWE. I did not mean to take any part in the discussion of this bill, and do not mean to take much part in it now. It seems to have been framed somewhat, as the lawyers say, with a double aspect. I understood the Senator from Oregon to say when he introduced the bill that its object was to enable those who have need of this timber to acquire it by purchasing and paying for it, and I sympathized with that purpose. I have no great ambition to see the Government of the United States undertake to hoard any good thing. All good things, I believe, are designed for use, and had better be used, just as much by this generation as any succeeding generation or any past generation. So, when the proposition was submitted to enable people to buy these lands and pay for them because they needed what was growing upon them or standing upon them, I sympathized with that purpose.

But the Senator from Illinois introduces the bill to us in a new as-But the Senator from Illinois introduces the bill to us in a new aspect and from a new point of view. He says that the object of this bill is not to enable men who need this timber to buy it, but it is to protect the timber, and his method is original. I think he says it is an experiment. It would not become me to condemn it in advance. It may succeed. He will allow me to say, however, that I have not entire confidence in the experiment. Briefly, it is to induce purchasers to go on to the outskirts of these forests and buy forty or one hundred and sixty acres and keep the swash of the world from drifting by them on to lands lying behind. It is ingenious, as I say: it is original as on to lands lying behind. It is ingenious, as I say; it is original, as I know. That it will succeed, I do not know. You take a flock of wolves and station them about a sheep-ranch, give each one of them a lamb apiece and you might protect possibly the residue of the flock, but I would not bet on it myself. I have not found these sentinels so absolutely reliable in my experience and I do not quite see what the inducement would be for them to stand guard over the thousands upon thousands of acres right in the rear of their lots, simply because they have got forty or one hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. President, I do not think this bill will save your timber. That is my impression about it. I speak modestly. I am willing, with the Senator from Ohio, that these lands shall be sold. I am of the opinion to-day, as I was yesterday, (and it is rather a remarkable thing perhaps to find a Senator who holds to the same opinion two days in suc-haps to find a Senator who holds to the same opinion two days in succession,) that it is fairer to sell the land with whatever stands upon it than to sell the growth upon the land, the stumpage. I do not propose to repeat the reasons why I prefer that.

I only want, therefore, two things to be done in this bill. One is that the Government shall get what those who most desire the lands are willing to pay, and the other is that everybody shall have a fair chance to buy the lands. I said yesterday and repeat to-day that there is but one way to secure that, and that is to offer the lands at public sale. I am utterly astonished to hear Senators as familiar with public sale. I am utterly astonished to hear Senators as familiar with the alienation of our public domain as the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Ohio say that that has proved a failure and has been abandoned. I undertake to say that they are mistaken upon both points. It never has been proved a failure, it never has been abandoned, but the Land Office is year after year offering lands at public sale and selling them.

Mr. SARGENT. As I made the statement that that had not been done for twenty years, I should like to have the Senator show some authority upon it. I say that since Buchanan's administration there have been no lands offered at public auction by the Government of the United States, unless it might be some Indian reservation or a Ittle military reservation; and I know of no instance of that kind.

Mr. HOWE. I undertake to say that they are offered every year.

I do not know that fact. They have not been within my personal knowledge; but I have known within my personal knowledge a score of such sales within twenty years. Senators certainly do not seek to controvert that. Mr. SARGENT.

Mr. SARGENT. I simply say I think the Senator is mistaken. Mr. KELLY. The Senator from California is correct. Mr. HOWE. What is the evidence?

Mr. KELLY. I know this: that for the last fifteen or twenty years none have been offered in the State of Oregon, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office has recommended that that system be abolished altogether.

Mr. HOWE. I noticed, as the Senator read the report, that the Commissioner made that very extraordinary recommendation. I say every Commissioner you have had has acted in direct disregard of it. I said yesterday, and repeat to-day, that Government lands have been sold at public auction for more than $50 an acre within a very few years, and within the county in which I live.

Mr. SARGENT. Under special legislation, the Senator will acknowledge; under special legislation, which was earnestly urged by the Representatives from Wisconsin, they insisting that if we would only apply it to those particular cases it would be some benefit to the Government. It was not under the general law. I mean to say that under the general law there has been no such offer of public land, and the Senator must admit that I am right in that.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; I will not admit it.

Mr. SARGENT. It was some timber land in Wisconsin. Excuse me; I do not wish to interrupt the Senator without his permission.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly; go on.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly; go on.

Mr. SARGENT. There was some timber land in the State of Wisconsin. There was very much doubt whether it could be sold at all or should be sold; and I remember the proposition was advanced and it was earnestly insisted upon; and some of us good-naturedly gave way and allowed a special law to be applied to the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator does not know what lands I refer to and I do not know to what lands he refers. I will now mention the lands to which I refer, which sold for more than $50 an acre. It was a portion of a tract of some seven thousand acres which formerly belonged to what was called the Fort Howard military reserve. That is one instance. That was sold under a special act, to be sure.

Mr. SARGENT. That is what I referred to.
Mr. HOWE. Unfortunately for the accuracy of the Senator's recollection, the law under which that was sold was passed before he came

Mr. SARGENT. When was it passed?

Mr. HOWE. In 1861.
Mr. SARGENT. I was in Congress at that time.
Mr. HOWE. Not in the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. I was in the House. I referred to the action of the House

Mr. HOWE. I have no doubt the Senator was in the House; and I have no doubt he was perfectly good-natured in the House.

Mr. SARGENT. I remember the legislation very well, and several instances have occurred since, and that precedent was urged in more recent legislation, which my recollection is was within the last five or six years.

Mr. HOWE. That is one instance. Another instance is that a township and a half which formerly belonged to the Stockbridge Indians, a reserve, was under a special law, because only under a special law could it be sold at all, brought into market. That was not only subdivided, but it was appraised and a new minimum put upon it, and then it was offered at public sale upon the condition that no tract should be sold at less than the appraised value, and should be sold as much higher as any one would give.

should be sold as much higher as any one would give.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator mean sealed bids?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; I mean at open public sale.

Mr. SARGENT. I supposed the Senator referred to those cases. 1

Mr. SARGENT. I supposed the Senator referred to those cases. I had them in my mind.

Mr. HOWE. And in both cases the land sold for very much more than the appraised value, for thousands of dollars more than the appraised value. But suppose those were the only cases, which they are not, I want to know, if combinations would not prevent the sale of a tract of seven thousand acres right in the neighborhood of a city and would not prevent the sale of a township and a half of land at above the minimum price, how can combinations prevent the appreciation of lands anywhere?

The Senator from Ohio ventured upon the extraordinary statement.

The Senator from Ohio ventured upon the extraordinary statement The Senator from Ohio ventured upon the extraordinary statement that it would not be safe for a man to bid a cent an acre above the minimum price at one of these sales. I feel bound to deny that. I have been for thirty years a resident upon what might be called the frontier; a large part of the time it was really your frontier. I know the sort of people who settle Territories. I went into Wisconsin when it had a population of less than 130,000. I have seen that State built up. I know the men who have built it up. I know that not an acre of land has ever been sold in that State except under a special grant, which granted it to one man, or in pursuance of laws which offered it first to the open bidding of every one. Is any Senator here prepared to controvert that statement?

Mr. SARGENT. I did not exactly catch the statement.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not exactly catch the statement.
Mr. HOWE. The statement is that not an acre of the whole territory of Wisconsin has ever been settled except by one of two methods: first, a grant of the land to a specific individual; and, secondly, ods: first, a grant of the land to a specific individual; and, secondly, under your general laws, which provided for offering every foot of it first at public sale, and if it be not purchased at public sale, making it open to private entry or homestead.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator mean that we have had no premption law providing for that?

Mr. HOWE. No, no; under your general law, which provides those three methods, pre-emption, homestead, and private entry after public sele.

public sale.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; but the pre-emption and homestead laws do not first require that the land shall have been offered at pub-

Mr. HOWE. Of course they do not.
Mr. SARGENT. Then I do not see the point the Senator makes.
Mr. HOWE. That no land has ever been purchased at private entry, I will say then, in that State that had not first been offered at public sale.

Mr. SARGENT. That is the rule universally. A correlative of the system of offering is that if no one purchases the land it shall then be open to private entry.

Mr. HOWE. Undoubtedly it is, and undoubtedly it will be here No possible detriment can follow from requiring these lands to be of-fered at public sale, except the mere insignificant sum it may cost to advertise them. I do not know why we required the lands in the several States of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, in the bill which was passed yesterday upon the motion of the Senator from Arkansas, to be offered at public sale. Why make a distinction? Why should we have required that of those lands and not of these? The allegation with regard to those lands was that it would be difficult to sell them at a dollar and a quarter. It is conceded that these lands are worth two dollars and a half. I suspect Senators would admit, if they were put upon their oaths, that great bodies of these lands are worth a good deal more than two dollars and a half.

I do not attach any particular importance to the machinery in this bill, which seems to be intended to limit the amount of land that one man shall acquire. I hope no member of the Committee on Public Lands and that no Senator on this floor expects that it will absolutely work a limitation. I do not conceive it will have that effect myself. On the contrary, the man who wants a thousand quarter sections and can find friends enough to buy them with his money, upon a contract to take the title and transfer the timber to him, can do it under this act with entire safety.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I do not quite agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that no detriment can come from offering these lands at public sale. I think an injury would arise in this, that, if they were offered in large quantities in these States and Territories, and the whole thereby become subject to private entry, they would be bought up for speculation and held in that way. I think that would be bad policy. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that the people of Wisconsin are so honest in these public-land sales. I think Wisconsin is exceptional in that regard, if we can offer there large bedies of nine lands at public sale and have free competition in hidbodies of pine lands at public sale and have free competition in bidding prevail. I think no other Senator can bear witness to the same thing in his State; and I may compliment the Senator from Wisconsin on the peculiar honesty of his constituency. I would not have been willing to do it until I heard him make the statment, for the reason that some of the pine-land men of Wisconsin have sometimes crossed the line into my State, and the reputation they have borne in land matters there is not quite so good as that stated by the Senator here to-day.
Mr. HOWE rose.

Mr. WINDOM. It may be because they had got into another State. The Senator perhaps wishes to answer that they got into mine; but that certainly has been the case when they have gone over on the Minnesota side.

Mr. HOWE. Who had legislation, the Senator will allow me to suggest, which opened to them larger opportunities than our laws ever did.

Mr. WINDOM. I was not aware of that. I believe the same general laws for selling land prevail in all the States. Certainly, men are disposed to take advantage of opportunities when presented to them, and I think that will be the case in all the States and Terri-

Now, I am unwilling that these large tracts of land in Washington and Oregon, and smaller tracts in the Territories named in this bill, shall be thus generally thrown open to private entry; but I think this bill should pass, and mainly for this reason: In the States and in all the Territories named in the bill there is absolutely, as I understand it, no way of obtaining small quanties of these timber lands for use by the farmers and others except by committing perjury. They are not open to private entry. They can only be taken under the pre-emption or homestead laws, and I do think any man who takes the lands described in this bill, not fit for cultivation, and swears before the land office that he has settled upon them and cultivated them to make a home of them, as he must under either of those laws, commits perjury. So I say the people of these States and Territories under the existing state of things are absolutely denied the use of any of these lands unless they commit perjury to get them. I want to relieve them from that necessity. This bill does not propose to open the lands generally to private entry. It does not propose to allow large tracts to be taken; but it does propose to give to the people of those States and Territories who desire them for their own use small quantities in an honest way by paying for them. For that reason, among others, I think the bill should pass.

The Senator from Ohio, in my judgment, touched one of the most objectionable arguments against the bill, and that is, that it does not go far enough in some of the Territories. I believe it would be better to allow companies who are actually manufacturing, or who can show that they are prepared to manufacture certain quantities of lumber per annum, to take a larger quantity of timber land than one hundred and sixty acres for their own use. I think that it would be a better policy, that it would avoid some of the difficulties mentioned, and that it would be liable to no serious objection. I do not wish any law that will tend to destroy the timber of the country; I wish to preserve as much of it as possible for the future; and yet I say to you that I believe it utterly impossible to prevent the people of the States and Territories here named, or of any other State, from taking I in some way so much of the timber lands within their borders as the demands of the present require. We must provide for it in an honest way or they will be at liberty to take it. If this bill proves upon trial not to have gone far enough in this direction, it will be open to amendment and may be enlarged in its operations in the future. I am therefore in favor of trying this bill, of making the experiment, so far as it goes; and I think that it is carefully made to the extent of the provisions of the bill. I believe that the pine lands of this country are of sufficient importance to justify more attention than is given to them by Congress or ever has been. I believe it would be good policy to appoint a commission to fully investigate that subject and to report to Congress the best means for taking care of and preserving them, and at the same time furnish to the people so much as is needed for present use. But I apprehend Congress would not be ready now to appoint such a commission. I certainly would vote for it with great pleasure. Until that be done I see no better meas-

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BOGY. Yes, sir.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was about to inquire what had become of what was the regular order yesterday, the case of Mr. Pinchback claiming to be a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not called up yesterday, and has been superseded by other business. It was subject to call then, has been superseded by other business. It was subject to call then, but was not called up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me to make a motion, I wish to get that subject before the Senate again. It is one, as stated by the Senator from Indiana a day or two ago, of high privilege, that has been delayed too long in this body; and I move therefore to postpone this and all other orders with a view to take up that while take up that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield for that purpose?

Mr. BOGY. I yield for any purpose.

Mr. MORTON. The Pinchback case was the unfinished business for yesterday, but I did not press it then, and did not propose to press it this morning for several reasons, and among them was the fact that there were several absent Senators who desired to be present when it was considered; and when the vote is taken on the case, I desire at least to have a full Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves the postponement of the present and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up what is known as the Pinchback case.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator desires to have it taken up simply for the purpose of making a speech or for debate, I shall not object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the short time I have served in this body, to the best of my recollection I have never moved to take up anything for the purpose of debate, or for the purpose of making a speech. The object of my motion is to do what the Senator from Indiana has so strongly impressed upon us was our bounden duty to do, and that is to get this case forward after proper discussion (it may last a considerable time, or it may not) to a final determination. That is the oberable time, or it may not) to a final determination. That is the object of my motion. The little I have to say I trust will not occupy thirty minutes. Perhaps I shall not have anything to say at all, but certainly my object is not to take it up for the purpose of delivering orations on the subject and laying it aside then to do something else.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator does not desire to speak to the question, but simply to take it up for the purpose of having it acted upon,
I shall certainly not consent to have it taken up to-day. There is one Senator anxious to be here who is sick and unable to be present; and Senator anxions to be here who is sick and unable to be present; and this was the case yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who is that?

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is he not paired?

Mr. MORTON. He was unable to effect a pair yesterday. That is the case also with other Senators. I hope when this question is voted on, after such a long delay, it will be with a full Senate. That is the only interest I have in it. I am ready to vote this instant. If the Senator desires to make a speech, of course I will accommodate him. Senator desires to make a speech, of course I will accommodate him, but he says he does not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We left off with the Senator from Indiana in the middle of some observations. I remember that I moved an executive session with his assent, because the Senator was evidently fatigued, and was not feeling well. Yesterday the matter got displaced in some way in my absence and contrary to my intention, so far as I had any-thing to do about it, which was, as the Senator from Indiana seemed to desire, to secure a final determination, after everybody had said what he desired to say. Now, if we are to wait in this body till seventy-three Senators, if that is the number excepting the State of Louisiana as to one, are present, then the matter of the right of Louisiana to another Senator here in the person of Mr. Pinchback will never be determined. mined at all. If any Senator is ill at this time who cannot come here to vote, who is to vote on the side of Mr. Pinchback, as I shall not, I certainy, if he has not made a pair, would feel it to be a matter of duty which I should be glad to extend to him, as other Senators have always done to me. I will pair with him with pleasure. My object is not to get a vote that does not make a fair expression of the Senate by any means; but I make this notion believing that the Senate is as full as it ever will be in the natural course of things, and because I think, as the Senator from Indiana has stated he thinks, that it is a matter of high duty to dispose of this question one way or the other. I do not know how it will be determined; I do not care how it will be determined except in the interests of what I think is the Constitution, the law, and the fact. Other Senators think otherwise. That is so as to every measure. Still we must determine it, and we ought to determine it, and that is my object in making the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the present and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the resolution for the admission of Mr. Pinchback.

I find that the honorable Senator from New Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. MERRIMON. I find that the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. Conkling] this morning reported adversely from the Judiciary Committee the bill (8. No. 69) to repeal so much of section 3480 of the Revised Statutes as forbids the payment of the accounts, claims, and demands therein named, and all laws and clauses of laws forbidding the payment thereof, and appropriating money to pay the same when duly established, and it was indefinitely postponed. At the time the report was made, I was either absent or my attention was not attracted to his action. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report presented yesterday and then

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeeration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagree-ing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress ap-proved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other pur-

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let the bill be read as it stands amended by the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be so read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution as it would stand if amended by the report of the committee of conference, as follows:

amended by the report of the committee of conference, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to transfer to the Treasurer of the United States, for the payment of the interest, due the 1st of February, 1876, on the bonds of said District, issued under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," the same from any unexpended appropriations heretofore made by Congress, or from any revenues derived by taxation on the property of said District of Columbia, subject to the requisition of said commissioners, excluding funds raised for the support of public schools: Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds, under or by virtue of said act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited: And provided, That the said commissioners are hereby directed to discontinue all work and labor on streets, avenues, bridges, sewers, canals, and structures of every kind the payment for which is to be made in 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That so much of the sixth section of the said act of June 20, 1874, as directs and requires the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury to audit and adjust the floating and unfunded debt of the District of Columbia, and issue certificates therefor, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; but this provise shall not prohibit the audit and issue of certificates for claims for work and labor already performed and materials furnished, not, however, to exceed in the aggregate of certificates the sum of $15,000,000, including those that have already been converted into 3.65 per cent. bends of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia; and any officer or person who shall knowingly increase, or aid or abet in increasing, such total indebtedness, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years, and by fine not exceeding $10,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Having stated yesterday the effect of this report, and it having been upon the tables of Senators up to the present time, I shall not deem it necessary to make any further statement unless I am called upon by some Senator to explain.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, on the discussion of this bill it appeared that something like a million and a half of dollars short of the fifteen millions authorized by it of bonds of the District guaranteed by the Government of the United States still remained unissued; and I understood it to be the sense of the Senate expressed by a number by the Government of the United States still remained unissued; and I understood it to be the sense of the Senate, expressed by a number of votes, that this funded debt, represented by bonds of the District paying 3.65 per cent. interest, should not be increased beyond the amount which had been issued up to the 27th day of January, 1876. It has pleased the committee of conference to yield on the part of the Senate that restriction upon this debt; and I for one hope the Senate will not concur in such agreement. As I said, by more than one vote—I think by several affirmative votes—the sense of the Senate was given against the present proposition of the committee of conference, and therefore, in making this proposition, it seems to me they have disre-against the present proposition of the committee of conference, and therefore, in making this proposition, it seems to me they have disregarded the expressed vote of the Senate on this subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my friend allow me a moment? He is greatly mistaken. He misapprehends the bill entirely. The limitation as to the amount of bonds stands precisely as it stood before.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I must misapprehend the report. The amendment proposed by the committee is to insert certain language found on pages 4 and 5 of the present report as printed, to strike out from line 23 to line 29, inclusive, of the first section, on the second page, and then to "strike out all of said Senate amendment after the word 'dollars,' in line 7 of section 2 of said amendment." Now, after line 7 and the word "dollars" we find this:

Provided, That the board of audit created by the act for the government of the District of Columbia, approved 20th June, 1874, is hereby abolished, and shall, immediately upon the approval of this resolution, transmit all the books and property in their possession belonging to the District to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and make a report of their proceedings not hitherto made: And provided further, That this resolution shall not in any way or manner recognize the liability of the United States to pay either the principal or interest of any of such bonds as may have been issued on or since the 27th day of January, 1876.

I say that this was the sense of the Senate proclaimed by more than one affirmative vote. The question was made before the Senate that claims had been improperly audited and bonds ordered to be issued and would be issued after the date at which this matter came up for consideration. The substantial reason for it all was this: That the Senate, and I know the country generally, were amazed to find that that which had been intended as a measure of retrenchment and reform had by some means or other been permitted to be nothing but form had by some means or other been permitted to be nothing but the confirmation of a grossly extravagant system of expenditure in this District; that after twenty millions of money had been spent upon the streets of this town in three years, five millions more were added in the fourth year; and upward of five millions more were proposed to be added in the fifth year. These were the very alarm-ing facts that came before the Senate and the country; and the action of the Senate was to put a stop to the possibility, under any construc-tion of the existing laws, of the continuance of a system of expendi-ture so grossly out of proportion to the size of this community or the capacity of the community or of the people of the United States to capacity of the community or of the people of the United States to bear such burdens.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, if the Senator will allow me, am I to understand him to say that, by the report of the committee, the limitation as to the bonds will be removed or enlarged?

Innitation as to the bonds will be removed or enlarged?

Mr. BAYARD. I say the limitation as to the amount of bonds which have been issued upon the audited claims up to or since the 27th day of January, 1876, is dropped out in this report.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There are two propositions, and they are included in this report. The first is to provide that there shall be no further issue of bonds; that stands in the report as the Senate agreed to it. No further issue of bonds is to take place. Now if the Senator will look on the second page, immediately following the limitation on the amount of the bonds, he will find the limitation on the certificates to be issued.

certificates to be issued.

Mr. BAYARD. What line?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On page 2, from line 23 to line 28 is stricken out. That was a limitation on the certificates.

Mr. BAYARD. It was true that was a limitation as to fifteen millions; but the limitation in a subsequent clause was an additional

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to make a further statement.

My understanding is that so far as the general limitation, both on bonds and certificates, is concerned, this report is identical in its effect with the bill as passed by the Senate. No further bonds are to be issued, and no certificates are to be issued beyond the sum of $15,000,000. That I understand to be the effect of the report of the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. In the long discussion we had on the subject of this bill the amendments which were offered struck me at the time as somewhat incongruous. The amendment which I desire to see retained was offered, I believe, by the Senator from Vermont, and was the subject of some discussion between him and me at that time. I showed, from figures which were sent to me by one connected with the city, that thirteen millions and some hundred thousands of dol-lars of bonds had been issued up to the 26th or 27th of January. It was proposed then, to test the sense of the Senate whether any more bonds at all should be issued, to add a proviso that this act should not bind the United States to pay the principal or the interest on any bonds issued after the 27th day of January. It was intended to arrest the issue of these bonds any further than had then been accomplished. Facts were stated to the Senate, to which I scarcely need recall their attention, showing that the system of audit had been, to say the least, excessively mysterious; and I believe a case was stated in this Chamber where a certificate issued to a man who stated that nothing whatever was due upon it. The system was so loose, or, as I said before, so mysterious, that a man to whom nothing was due could procure a certificate that something was due. Under a state of affairs so alarming as that, we found the amount had rolled up to a sum so staggering as $5,000,000 for the repairs of streets in a town of this size for a single year, upon the heels of having in three years before that time spent the frightful sum of $20,000,000. I do not wonder, Mr. President, that the Senate stood aghast at it; and this bill, as I understood the action of the Senate, was to make such further expenditures impossible; and if there had been either inaccurate or improper allowances under this system of a board of audit, they were to be impossible after the Senate had passed upon the subject.

Now, what do we find? Here was a clear, incisive repeal of the power of the board of audit further to continue a system which had worked so loosely and with such monstrous extravagance. It simply abolished that board of audit and directed them immediately to trans fer their books and the property in their possession to the District commissioners and to make up a report of their proceedings not hitherto made. I do not believe, Mr. President, that that measure of reform can be improved, and I do not think that the report of this committee of conference is committee of conference is any improvement on it; but, on the contrary, it does go on in some degree still to recognize the operations of board of audit. After providing that so much of the act of June 20, 1874, "as directs and requires the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury to audit and adjust the floating and unfunded debt of the District of Columbia, and issue certificates therefor, be, and the same is hereby, repealed," it goes on

But this provise shall not prohibit the audit and issue of certificates for claims for work and labor already performed and materials furnished, not, however, to exceed in the aggregate of certificates the sum of $15,000,000.

What does this provide? It is a continuance of authority in a board of audit for whose acts the commissioners by their friends on this floor hold themselves not responsible. When I asked the honor-able Senator from Indiana and the honorable Senator from California whether it was or not true that certain private counsel for the old board of public works had been paid large fees out of the United States Treasury in the shape of 3.65 bonds, they told me that they did not know whether it was so or not. The Senator from Indiana, I think, at first denied it, and then said he did not know about it, but he only knew that the commissioners had not approved it. That such a claim was paid and paid by the board of audit, that certifi-cates were issued by them, that the certificates went, in some indi-rect way, to the city of New York and came back here through a national bank who obtained the bonds, I believe is a fact which can be readily established. It is not, I understand, denied by those who would defend the action of the board of public works or the board of

Now I say that my sense is to approve the action of the Senate as stated in section 2, and I trust therefore that no further operations, to the amount of one farthing, of a board of audit that has permitted such claims to aggregate against the Treasury, as this board has done, will be listened to for one moment by the Senate. The action of the Senate was, I think, thoroughly understood by them, and the action of the committee of conference abandons the ground which I hoped had been successfully taken by the Senate, and which I still hope they

My attention has been called by the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the fact that the clause remains which declares that "any officer or person who shall knowingly increase or aid or abet in increasing such total indebtedness shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor" and be punished by fine and imprisonment. I have heard that amendment often and I did not concur in it; I did approve of it. It seems to me that this thing of carrying on a government by terrorism and inflicting high penalties upon civil officers for maladministration is not the way to meet the evil. The President of the United States is responsible for the action of his appointees; and if looking at the state of affairs in this District he shall see that the confidence imposed in those officials has been abused, it is in his power instantly to render them powerless by removing them from office. we have a fair and a correct administration there is no necessity for these high penalties making it a misdemeanor punishable by a long term of imprisonment and heavy fine. The best control of this country is in a sound and honest public opinion. The best control of this country is in a rigid administration and an honest administration of the law. I always would couple power with responsibility. I would never stand in the way by factious opposition of the fair exercise of a high discretion; but, when it had been exercised and power granted for the purpose, I then would hold the appointing power to responsibility. I did not approve of that amendment, and, had the vote been taken formally in the Senate, I should have recorded myself against I do not believe in the exercise of violent coercive powers in civil administration.

I remember the objection was made by my friend from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] at the time that the jurisdiction of the offense here created was not pointed out, nor the proper machinery adequate to carry it into force. He considered this amendment as brutum fulmen, as something that would be simply there to terrify those who were ignorant that it could not be made effective. Therefore this section of fine and imprisonment I give very little value to; and I would not have cared if the committee had stricken it out. It is the latter part of the section that I do consider valuable and that I trust the Senate will insist upon retaining.

It is of importance to us that the liability of the United States to pay the principal or interest on these bonds should be investigated, and certainly it should not be extended beyond the day when the facts were brought to our knowledge of this excessive issue of bonds, and this alarming increase of the public dobt of the United States, or, what is the same thing, a debt of the District for which the United States had by their legislation made their Treasury answerable.

There were other provisions in the original bill, found on page 2, which the House originally coupled with a cautionary provision:

That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any such bonds which have been issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

I regretted exceedingly that the Senate did not retain that proviso. trust still that the House may insist upon retaining it, and I do not see how any fair creditor of this District or of this Government can ask to receive principal and interest on Londs which had been issued in violation of law. It does not affect the bonam fidem of his claim; it does not affect his right in morals and in law to have his claim paid; but it does affect, and it ought to affect, the obligation of the people of the United States to pay bonds issued in violation of law. Ignorance of the law excuses no one, and men who have taken these bonds under this loose system, issued without law, took them, in my opinion, equitably at their peril. I trust by my votes here to exhibit as much of a proper anxiety to sustain the honorable obligations and the credit of this Government as any other member of the body; but the way to do that, the way to make such professions of any weight or importance, is to couple them with acts to show that you mean to adhere to your just obligations; for, if we embark on such a system as I hoped had been uprooted by the debate of last week on this subject, then gentlemen may talk about meeting their obligations, but the capacity to meet them will be gone, for the debt will be too large for our mastery.

I trust, Mr. President, that the Senate will insist upon the amendments placed here, and which I cannot but believe are in accord with the sentiment of the other House, and that we shall not forsake the simple, plain, direct abolition of this board of audit, and a cutting off of all their powers after the 26th day of January, 1876, at which time the Senate became aware of the result of their action in the District. The report of the conference committee, it seems to me, weakens the force of that, because it provides that this amendment shall not prohibit the issuance of certificates on claims for work and labor already performed and materials furnished. Who is to judge of that? Who is to judge whether work and labor have been already performed and materials furnished? There were read here in the Senate a dozen cases where men were paid ten, sixteen, and one hundred fold upon completed contracts. Until this shall be explained and until we are satisfied by some other machinery than that of this board of audit that work and materials have been furnished and that labor has been performed, I, for one, wish to record my vote against the power of this board of audit to bind the Treasury of the United States to the payment of one other farthing.

I regard the amendment of the Senator from Vermont adopted, as I say, by more than one affirmative vote of the Senate, that this debt should not be increased one dollar beyond what it was on the 26th day of January, 1876, as essential; and I do not see the power of the committee to yield, and, even if it was in their power, I trust the Senate will not sustain them in it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I had hoped that as to this subject of the 3.65 bonds the discussion we had on it on a former occasion would have sufficed. I suppose the real question now is, so far as the Senate takes an interest in it, whether this report is in essential accord with the bill which was the expression of the Senate out of which the report grows. Now, I submit that to all intents and purposes, with one exception to which I will refer in a moment, and which is entirely explainable, it is identical with the bill itself. My colleagues on the committee will bear me witness that that is the effect of the report.

Take the first feature of the bill as it passed the Senate, and what was it? The payment of this interest in the mode provided. That is here. The second feature in the bill was that no further bonds should be issued. That is here. The third proposition in the bill as passed by the Senate was that there should be a limitation on the certificates to be issued, $15,000,000; that they should not exceed that. That is preserved in the report of the committee. So that thus far you see the report and the bill are identical.

The next proposition was the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. If my honorable friend had done the committee the honor of having read their report before he spoke, he would have found that he had no reason to complain that that was not in the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I read the report through, and more than once, from beginning to end.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then my honorable friend has made a most surprising mistake, because he says the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, which he most cherished, is not in the report. It is in it in hac verba, every word of it. Thus far the report and the Now what is the divergence between this report and the bill? Let me tell the honorable Senator and the Senate. The only difference is this, and I submit to the Senate whether they believe it is essennot: By a clause inserted in the bill on the motion of my that or not: By a clause inserted in the bill on the motion of my honorable friend from Kentucky [Mr. Stevenson] the board of audit was abolished; in the report it is suspended; its functions are suspended absolutely and unqualifiedly, with one exception; and what is that? They shall have a right to put into certificates what they have already audited, and they shall have the right to audit certain claims growing out of work and labor performed and materials furnished, which were to be carried into 3.65 bonds.

Mr. STEVENSON Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the honorable Senator abow me to ask him a question?
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.
Mr. STEVENSON. If I understand this report it professes to limit both the certificates and the bonds to $15,000,000. That was clearly a limitation which a large majority of the Senate intended to put upon the bill. Now, the question that I propound to him is this: Suppose that this board of audit, which we did abolish, but which this conference report for certain purposes continues, should, in auditing and issuing certificates of claims for work and labor already performed or materials furnished, exceed the $15,000,000, what becomes

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my honorable friend will turn to the fifth page he will see.

Mr. STEVENSON. I read from the fifth page.
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The language there is: "Work and labor already performed and materials furnished, not, however, to exceed in the aggregate of certificates the sum of $15,000,000, including those that have already been converted into 3.65 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia," thereby preserving the limitation in the bill of fifteen millions, including all that had theretofore been issued.

Now, a single word upon this suspension of the board of audit instead of its abolition. I will state the reason for that. There was no objection to the abolition of it, except upon the suggestion that the House of Representatives, if I have a right to refer to that, are already investigating the board of audit; and it was suggested that while that was being done it was not quite the thing to take it out of the power of a committee of the House to make that investigation against the board of audit. For that reason, and that reason alone, it was suspended instead of abolished.

One other remark as to the board of audit. It appears by a statement from the board of commissioners that the whole amount of audit ment from the board of commissioners that the whole amount of addition to the 9th of February was $14,577,646.44, which are put into certificates, and there are two hundred and four thousand and odd dollars audited and not in certificates, and $179,000 of supposed claims for labor and for materials furnished, which make the aggregate sum $14,962,092.29. This extension of authority will cover these two facts: first, the right to issue certificates on the two hundred and four thousand and odd dollars and, next, the right to audit the balance in certificates, but no right to carry them into bonds.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator. He says that the conference report does not abolish the board of audit, but suspends it after it has audited in the aggregate $15,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; after it has audited a certain class of claims which come short of $15,000,000, according to the estimate, but in no case to exceed $15,000,000.

Mr. DAWES. What is the condition of the board of audit after they have audited those claims?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They are simply a board in existence,

Mr. DAWES. With salaries of $2,000 each ?
Mr. DAWES. Suspended with a salary of $2,000 each and nothing to do.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That would be the effect of it probably.
Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator think that desirable?
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think it would be good legislation to do it for the purpose of paying the salary; but the committee did think it desirable that while the House of Representatives were investigating the board Congress should not abolish the board.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the law to add to the present salary of the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury $2,000 each for the services which they render as this board of audit. I understand the Senator to say that after the performance of a certain duty prescribed here they are to be suspended as to everything else except the drawing of this $2,000 each.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will thank the honorable Senator not to put language in my mouth which I did not use. If he intends to make that statement to the country I did not say any such thing.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator be so kind as to enlighten me upon the functions of this board of audit after they have audited this class of claims?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will undertake to enlighten my honorable friend so far as any question arising on this report is concerned; but as to undertaking to enlighten my honorable friend upon any speculative opinions that he may have or upon any speculative questions of the control of t tions lying outside of this report, he is as well informed as I am and can draw his own conclusions.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will excuse me. I understood him to ay that he thought the effect of it would be to continue their salary

$2,000 each.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But the Senator from Maine did not say, nor did the Senator from Massachusetts, I take it, understand that the Senator from Maine said that this board were to be continued after they had exercised the authority herein prescribed, for the purpose of drawing the salaries. I did not say that, and the Senator certainly should not put that language into my mouth to go to the country.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Maine will pardon me. I had no intention of putting that language into his mouth, but I had the intention of ascertaining whether it was the purpose of the Senator, whether it was the object that they should have the power to draw $2,000 additional salary although all their functions were suspended except that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I believe I said to the honorable Senator that I supposed that would be the effect.

Mr. DAWES. That was what I understood the Senator from Maine to say, and I asked him after that if he thought that was desirable.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My complaint was that the Senator undertook to characterize a remark I made by using language I did

Mr. DAWES. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the conference report has left this board of audit in this singular position. It is highly important, I understand, that they should not be abolished after all their duties are performed, and I can conceive of no other reason and no other effect than that suggested by the Sentral Maintain that it is the said of the sa ator from Maine, that it leaves them in the enjoyment of a salary of $2,000 each indefinitely. I submit to the Senate that the committee of conference should have taken care that no such result as that should have followed the conference report. If they are of any service whatever after they are suspended, after the limitation is reached suggested by the conference report, the Senator from Maine has failed to indicate it, and I think, therefore, he should have taken pains that they should not have been permitted in this suspended state to draw

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I believe I have the floor. It ought to be satisfactory, I submit to my honorable friend, that the committee have already explained through their chairman the reason why this board were left suspended after the partial duty devolved upon them had been accomplished. It was that the other branch of Congress were dealing with them in their official relations, and while they were dealing with them in their official relations, and while they were so dealing with them the propriety of allowing them to exist in their official relations was suggested. I say the fitness and propriety of the thing was suggested that they should be left in that position. It might have been proper, it might have been well that we should have provided ultimately for their abolition; but my honorable friend knows very well that when the House of Representatives has done dealing with that board it will be a very easy thing to abolish them. That is the way the committee has left it. Finding this board with their duties nearly finished, the committee provide for the finishing of those duties, and then instead of abolishing them they suspend them on the ground that the other branch of Congress is dealing with them on the ground that the other branch of Congress is dealing with them as a board. That is the whole of it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that the statement of the Senator from Maine that these salaries continue, the question being asked when he was on the floor, merits a little reflection. I understand that this board of audit consists of certain Comptrollers whose offices exist by the laws of the United States and for which there is a salary, and that certain additional duties are imposed upon them by law and for the discharge of those duties they receive at the rate of $2,000 a year, and this proposed law permanently suspends those duties after a certain time. I do not believe that $2,000 continues at all. They get that $2,000 not as a salary, not as an incident to their office, but for a duty imposed upon another office, and when you take omee, but for a duty imposed upon another office, and when you take away the duty the compensation falls with it.

Mr. DAWES. It may be a good reason why the salary should fall with it. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not understand it to be salary.

Mr. DAWES. Doubtless the Senator is correct; the Senator has a clearer idea of what the law is than myself; but from the knowledge I have had of the action of these officers and the construction put upon the laws in the District of Columbia, I have my apprehensions. While it may be and doubtless is the opinion of the Senator that the compensation ends, that will probably be the last conclusion to which this board of audit will come. It is just as easy to abolish the board of audit after their duties are performed as it is to suspend the board of audit after their duties are performed as it is to suspend them. It takes no more words in the statute to do the one than it does the other. And as long as the House of Representatives is not examining what the board of audit is going to do hereafter but only what the board of audit has done I do not see that it will throw any obstacle in the way of their examination or do any injustice to the board of audit to say that now their functions are all performed, their duties all done, they might as well cease to exist as a board of audit. If any other branch of the Government desires to examine into the character of what they have done herefore, it throws no obstacle character of what they have done heretofore, it throws no obstacle in their way. It does not embarrass the board of audit; it does not their way. It does not emparrass the board of addit; it does not reflect upon the board of audit that we say "having discharged all the duties contemplated by law, you are to cease to exist," rather than on the other hand to say "you are suspended"—I do not know what that means—"you are suspended with nothing to do." The Senator from Maine is of opinion that they are suspended to all intents and purposes except the drawing of their salaries. The Senator from New Jersey thinks that they are totally and absolutely suspended. It seems to me that we should not leave a chance for any more strange constructions of the law by paid attorneys upon which we may be landed nobody knows where. Let us make plain terms of this and say, "When this board of audit have done certain work which we presay, "When this board of audit have done certain work which we prescribed for them, having nothing further for them to do as a board of audit, they shall as a board of audit cease to exist." That would seem to be the natural way. I do not quite see through this method of going round and round and round again in this matter.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt that if we could have had the benefit of the advice of the Senator from Massachusetts we should have efit of the advice of the Senator from Massachusetts we should have made the report perfect. As it is, we tried to do the best we could without his assistance. We absolutely repeal the law which provided for the performance of certain functions by these officers, saying, however, that before the repeal shall take effect they shall discharge their duties up to a certain limit. The original law provided that for discharging these duties these officers of the Treasury should receive $2,000 compensation, and we then repeal the law which authorizes them to discharge the duties, and of course they receive no further compen-Whether this might not have been put in better phrase than Massachusetts raises the question, I shall submit at once; but of course we have no power to amend this report. Substantially it does repeal any power of these parties to discharge these duties at all. It repeals any authority under the act whatever. For discharging these duties they were to receive a certain compensation. Of course the compensation falls with the repeal of the law which gave them this power. It is not in the form of a salary at all. The sixth section of the act of 1874 which is referred to says:

Each of the said officers constituting said board shall be paid the sum of $2,000 for his services under this act.

· When a subsequent section comes in and says he shall not discharge service under the act, of course the compensation falls. I suppose is perfectly proper to say that it was at the earnest request of the members of the conference committee from the House that words were not used actually abolishing the board. They stated that at that time an investigation was going on, and it would faciliate the investigation to have the board have some organized power. We yielded to this consideration which seemed to spring, on their part, out of fairness. We therefore allowed the board to continue without any duties to discharge as a board beyond those prescribed.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, certainly the Senate by a very de cided vote put upon this joint resolution the language which I will read:

That the board of audit created by the act for the government of the District of Columbia, approved 20th June, 1874, is hereby abolished.

Now, that which is agreed upon by the conference committee does not merely suspend them, but it is:

That so much of the sixth section of the said act of June 20, 1874, as directs and requires the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury to audit and adjust the floating and unfunded debt of the District of Columbia and issue certificates therefor be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

That is what they call suspending; but they add:

But this proviso shall not prohibit the audit and issue of certificates for claims for work and labor already performed and materials furnished, not, however, to exceed in the aggregate of certificates the sum of $15,000,000, including those that have already been converted into 3.65 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia.

Why is that in? Certainly, as the discussion went on before the Why is that in? Certainly, as the discussion went on before the Senate the other day, there was a vote that showed we were disposed to put a stop to their auditing or issuing certificates for any sum at all. This suspends them, but says that if by any providential interposition they have not got up to $15,000,000 they may go on while suspended and run it up to that. I object to that. I think we had better stand upon the original proviso on this subject inserted by the Senate. It will be remembered that the proviso which had been previously adopted by the Senate, by which they provided that the board should not issue beyond $15,000,000, was substantially nullified by this last; for we abolished the board at once, prohibited them from issuing certificates, auditing claims, or doing anything else. And it seems certificates, auditing claims, or doing anything else. And it seems to me that the yielding should be in reference to striking out the $15,000,000 clause of the original joint resolution and we should adhere to that which puts a stop to any more certifying of indebtednes here, or to any more certificates, in view of what was said on this floor before we adopted the last proviso and after we adopted the first.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, as I understand the case, there were but three questions to be determined. First, the amount of bonds to be issued. We all agree that in the report of the conference committee that provision is the same as it was in the bill as the Senate passed it. There is no change whatever in that respect. The next point was as to the extent of the certificates to be audited. The limitation is identically the same, $15,000,000.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to inquire of the Senator from West Virginia whether it is not true that the provise afterward inserted, by which we abolished the board, put an end to them at once though they had not got up to the $15,000,000 limit?

Mr. DAVIS. I will come to that in a moment. We will take the words of the bill as it passed the Senate, and they are the same. There is no difference whatever as to the limit upon certificates audited by this board of audit.

Mr. BAYARD. I submit to the honorable Senator that there is a difference

Mr. DAVIS. There may be a difference of opinion; but the provisions are certainly the same, as I believe.

Mr. BAYARD. If it is so, what is the object of the committee changing it? Mr. DAVIS. The committee, as I think, have not changed it. They have not used the same words, because it was admitted here in the Senate by a sort of general opinion that a portion of what was added by my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] was immaterial; and in fact it was moved to reconsider for the purpose of striking that out; but afterward it was said, I believe by the Senator from that out; but afterward it was said, I believe by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Sherman,] that it could go to a committee of conference, and there it could be arranged.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let me say to the Senator from West Virginia that the amendment which I offered was "that the board of audit created by the act for the government of the District of Columbia, approved 20th June, 1874, is hereby abolished, and shall, immediately upon the approval of this resolution, transmit all the books and property in their possession belonging to the District to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and make a report of their proceedings not hitherto made." That amendment was adopted with almost unanimity. It was put on the resolution by almost the unanimous vote of the Senate. Now the conference report says that the act creating the board is repealed, but that repeal is subject to a proviso which authorizes this same auditing board to go on and audit claims and issue certificates for claims for work and labor already done or materials furnished.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator understand that the duty of the committee of conference is to report a codified bill as it passed the Senate, or are they a committee of full and free conference, to go and consult with the representatives of the other House, and to bring in a bill as near as is consistent with the circumstances agreeing with the sense of the Senate?

sense of the Senate?

Mr. STEVENSON. To the Senator from California I say it is their business to go on and have a full and fair conference. I am replying, however, to a statement of the Senator from West Virginia that there is no material change. That is the difference. I say that there is a manufacture of the Senator from the beard of a maintain the senator of the senator for the beard of a maintain the senator for the senator for a maintain the senator for the senator form California I say it is their business to go on and have a full and fair conference. I say that there is a manufacture of the senator form the senator form however, to a statement of the Senator from West Virginia that there is no material change. That is the difference. I say that there is a material change; and that, so far from abolishing the board of audit, they have a right under this report to go on and audit, as I understand, claims for work and labor already performed and materials furnished. When? After the 1st of July? This does not state.

Mr. DAVIS. Allow me to state to my honorable friend from Kentucky that I have not come to that yet. I said there were three questions submitted: one as to the board, which I had not yet come to when he interrupted me. I think my friend from Kentucky, as well as my friend from Delaware, probably does not know all the surroundas my friend from Delaware, probably does not know all the surroundings of a committee of conference. The Senate alone is not the committee of conference. There are two sides to a conference. If the Senate could have had its own way, why send the bill to a committee of conference? Something has to be yielded by each body. In this case I think the Senate got the lion's share and yielded the least.

In regard to the provision as to the amount to which the board of audit were limited, as I thought in committee and as I think now, the limit is identically the same in the report and in the bill as passed by the Senate, namely, $15,000,000 The report furnished the committee by the commissioners states that there are to be audited from one hundred to two hundred thousand dollars. It is believed, so far as the board of commissioners are concerned, that they will stop short of that. The Senate had limited it to $15,000,000, and the report uses the same words that the Senate had adopted as to that limitation.

Now, as to the abolishing of the board of audit, we probably would all have agreed upon that and stopped it immediately, but there were two reasons which to my mind were sufficient to induce us to yield something on that matter. First, it is known that there are perhaps a thousand men in this District who have earned perhaps $100,000 in all, and these wages are from ten to fifty dollars each. This money is due now by contract. Unless in some way or other this $100,000, or about that, is audited or arranged or in some way taken up, the parties who have performed the labor cannot be paid. That was a consideration with me. Whether or not it was with others, is for

Mr. EATON. May I ask my friend a question? Is this suspended board of audit going to take care of these laborers?

Mr. DAVIS. I did not use any such expression.

Mr. EATON. I know you did not, but I did. I asked if they were.

Mr. DAVIS. I cannot tell. My friends may differ from me, but I think it will furnish the means of paying them. Now, as to whether the board is going to take care of the laborers of the contractors, I did not intend to refer to that; but, as it has been asked, I may say that probably the men will be taken care of through that channel, and perhaps properly so. These men have earned their money, as I believe, and their employers—contractors—have claims now pending to the extent of about $100,000 not audited. There is no certificate or anything by which the contractors can have any evidence of indult. anything by which the contractors can have any evidence of indebt-edness from the District to them, so as to get money to pay those laborers, and of course it cannot be done, and will remain just as it is, and the men must go without their wages, unless in some way or other the accounts are settled.

The report of the committee of conference steps all work instanter. They cannot go one step further. It does more than that, I understand; it provides only for payment on work already performed, not work hereafter to be performed, and materials already delivered.

There is another consideration. We all perhaps understand that there is an investigation now going on on the part of the House of Representatives; and perhaps if this board of audit were abolished just now the effect might be to stop that investigation. I am for a thorough investigation, a proper and honest investigation; and I have no desire whatever to put anything in the way or to prevent a thorough investigation into matters in the District of Columbia; but let everything that has been done, wrong or right, come to light. If the board were abolished the question might be raised whether the investigation could be continued. The committee of the House was certainly in communication with the commissioners and with the certainly in communication with the commissioners and with the board, getting information. It may be that they will be continued in office but a short time. Their salary ceases, as we understand. In fact, I thought nothing of the amount of salary, the $2,000 which the Senator from Massachusetts thinks so much of, and which appears to be the ruling thought with him. It would not have weighed with me a minute, on the question whether to continue this board of audit for one week or two weeks longer, as the case might be, that we had to pay them $50 or $100, or whatever the amount might be, if by so doing we stowed an important investigation from going on doing we stopped an important investigation from going on.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not think the response of the Senator from West Virginia is satisfactory at all as to the failure of the committee to comply with the manimous consent of the Senate for the abolition of this board of audit. I do not doubt the motives and I do not doubt the capacity or the power of the conference committee to interchange a free conference of sentiment as to what the subject-matter before them should demand; but, when the Senate of the United States had by so large a vote determined to abolish this board of audit, it does seem to me that the conference committee ought at least to have carried out that sentiment. Why was the Senate so nearly unanimous in the abolition of the board of audit? It was because they had audited claims that ought not to have been audited. This conference committee knew that the board of audit had recommended and au-dited claims for attorneys' fees to the old board of public works.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not know it.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not know it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I state it on the authority of one of the board of audit himself. He told me that they had audited attorneys' fees, and I do not believe they had any authority, as I stated to him, to audit them. I wanted to stop the board of audit, and therefore I offered this amendment, and I had hoped that it would be recommended by the approximate of conference of the state of mended by the committee of conference.

Now, sir, the mere fact that there may be outstanding claims due to workmen whom I desire to see paid, and whom Congress can pay without continuing this board of audit, is no satisfactory answer to me why the board of audit should be continued. But let me ask the Senator from West Virginia, suppose it should turn out that there are outstanding claims of honest, upright workmen, which should bring the total to an amount exceeding fifteen millions, what will he do?

Mr. DAVIS. As I said before, the board of audit is abolished by this report for all purposes except for the one specific purpose stated in the report, and that is to audit a certain amount of claims for labor and materials, and for no other purpose whatever, and the total shall not exceed $15,000,000 under any circumstances. The Senator from Kentucky asks, suppose it exceeds $15,000,000, what then? My answer is that the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia state that it is less than $15,000,000. Now let me ask the Senator, suppose the senator supposed the senator supposed the senator supposed the senator supposed to the senator supposed the senator supposed to the senator pose there are more certificates out now than the $15,000,000 limited by the Senate, would not the same thing exist exactly? There is no further indebtedness to take place. If it is real indebtedness this re-ort does not change it one way or the other. My understanding is that it is less than $15,000,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will state to my friend from West Virginia the difference between him and myself. Both of us want to pay all just claims. I want to pay every debt that is justly due to the laborer or to anybody else; but I am not willing to let this board of audit who I know have audited improper claims, continue any longer and ting. I would have some other changed to the relationship. auditing. I would have some other channel to audit any just claims.

If this board of and which this conference report continues submit to us a larger sum of just claims than the $15,000,000 limit, what shall we do about them? Shall it be that those who come first, whether just or not, shall be first paid, and those who do not come in before the limit of $15,000,000 as reported by this board of audit shall have been reached are to go unpaid; or shall we have another appeal to Congress to make another appropriation for an amount of just claims reported by this board of audit over and above the $15,000,000?

This board of audit having audited claims already that ought not to have been audited, I want to see it abolished. The Senate did determine to abolish it. That is the conference report; although it says the law establishing the board is repealed, yet gives it power to go If this board of audit which this conference report continues submit the law establishing the board is repealed, yet gives it power to go on and audit and issue certificates for claims for work and labor performed and materials furnished, without limiting the amount of those claims. It is true you say the total shall not exceed fifteen millions; but suppose the amount does exceed fifteen millions, shall those that come last not be paid? The true way, and I state it with great deference—the true way for this conference committee was if possible to have adhered to the limitations imposed by the Senate.

I agree heartily with the Senator from Delaware in his summing up of his objections to this report. There have been bonds issued, in my judgment, which are fraudulent in the hands of the holders, and I would not pay one cent until I could know how many of those bonds were fraudulent; and still less would I allow this board—which is here in terms abolished and yet permitted to go on and commit it may be the same sort of errors which it has committed before—to audit claims for work and labor done, whether attorneys' fees or not, and bring in an amount of claims greater than the fifteen millions. If they do that, although you limit them to that amount, the just claimants who have equitable rights against the Government will come in and ask to be paid. That is the reason why I object to the port.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I have not been long a member of this body, and may not know fully the duties of a conference committee. I had supposed that the function of a conference committee was very plain. I know, as the honorable Senator from West Virginia says, that they have to meet with the committee of the other House, and agree if possible; but I beg leave to say to my honorable friend from West Virginia, and to every other member of the conference committee, that they have first to nurse the child that a majority of the Senate has given them.

I do not mean to find any fault with this committee or with the honorable Presiding Officer who appointed them; but it is a little out of my experience and observation of bodies acting under the parliamentary law to find a committee appointed to represent the majority of the Senate composed, a majority of them, of those who had been opposed to the action of the Senate. I had supposed that by every rule of parliamentary law—certainly every one that I ever heard of—a majority of the body in the vote should always be represented on the conference committee.

Now I undertake to say that there is not one single thing that the majority of the Senate did but what the conference committee have majority of the Senate did but what the conference committee have abandoned—not one. My honorable friend from Maine and my honorable friend from West Virginia fall back, not upon the action of the majority of the Senate, but upon the bill. A majority of the Senate and a very large majority of the Senate said, not that there should be $15,000,000 of 3.65 bonds, but that there should be $13,900,000, if I am right in the amount, of these bonds and not one other bond issued afterward. The whole of that is abandoned. A large majority of the Senate said that not one dellar of the bonds hould be will be will be suited. the Senate said that not one dollar of the bonds should be paid, either principal or interest, which were issued after a certain day. That the committee have abandoned utterly. The provision in regard to the abolition of the board of audit was passed by a unanimous vote, and the committee have utterly abandoned that. If there were any honorable Senators who were opposed to the abolition of the board of audit, they certainly were well represented by this committee.

Now, Mr. President, the only question before the Senate is this:

Will the Senate recede from its action on every one of these amendments? I find no fault with the committee. They did as they thought was best, beyond all question.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Do I understand him to say that the committee recede from all the amend-

Mr. EATON. I said that there was no one particular in which the majority of the Senate amended this bill that the committee have not receded from. If there is, I beg my honorable friend from West Virnia to tell me what it is.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask my friend as to the first clause, as to the limit on the amount of the bonds. Is not that the same in the report as in the bill as passed by the Senate?

Mr. EATON. The language is—Provided. That any further issue of 3.65 bonds under or by virtue of said act of Congress, approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited.

Mr. DAVIS. Is not that there? Mr. EΛΤΟΝ. That is not all. There is another amendment of the Senate which belongs with that. They belong together.

Provided further. That this resolution shall not in any way or manner recognize the liability of the United States to pay either the principal or interest of any such bonds as may have been issued on or since the 27th day of January, 1876,

Doubtless legislation is desirable on this question. It is unfortunate that the House and the Senate cannot agree upon this subject without a majority of the Senate abandoning everything which a few days since they thought valuable. If I had been on the conference committee, I think I should have represented the majority of the Senate in this way: when the House committee said to me, "O, no, we cannot take that amendment of the Senate, that is not right; O, no, we will not take that other amendment of the Senate, that is not right; we will not take that third amendment, that is not right; you take ours;" I think I should have reminded them of that anecdote of the western hunter who said that turkey was never said to him once. [Laughter.] It seems to me that the committee have abandoned our ground, the ground of the majority of the Senate; they think with good reason, and therefore they sustain their report; I think with no good reason, and therefore I oppose their report. Let us see what the House of Representatives may do; then the Senate can act further

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I am quite surprised that my honorable friend from Connecticut feels that he has a grievance on the ground that the committee did not sustain his amendment, because, if I understood anything, it was that he had abandoned that himself. I understood him to admit that it was the offspring of a misconception of facts on his part, and he certainly apologized for that at the time.

Mr. EATON. I beg pardon. I do not quite understand the honor able Senator from Maine. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What I was saying was that I was quite surprised to learn that the Senator from Connecticut seemed to have a grievance that the committee had left out the amendment which he had the honor to present.

Mr. EATON. That is only a part of it, and a small part of it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That should be no part of it, in my judgment. I understood from the Senator that he offered that under a misconception of the facts, and when it was corrected he expressed his regret that he had ever offered it.

Mr. EATON. Never have I expressed my regret. I should like to see that in the RECORD.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let me read it:

I express the regret which of course every Senator must feel who makes any statement on info mation that is not accurate.

Mr. EATON. Very well. Now does the honorable Senator from Mr. EATON. Very well. Now does the honorable Senator from Maine undertake to say that that expression has anything to do with my amendment. It was simply this, as the Senator from California [Mr. Sargent] well knows: I had stated on the floor of the Senate that I had information that certain acts had been performed by a certain body, and I regretted afterward that I made my statement on information which in that particular turned out not to be correct; but, at the same time, I said it made no difference as to the amendment; that the act of the board was not right and not just.

Mr. MORRHLL, of Maine. The point was this, Mr. President: The beauty also Senator from Connecticut thought he had information that honorable Senator from Connecticut thought he had information that the board of audit, while Congress was still acting on this question, had issued certain bonds.

Mr. EATON. They had; that is true.
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That was his information. The Senator from California produced information here on the authority of one of the parties themselves to the effect that no such transaction had taken place

Not so, if the honorable Senator from Maine pleases. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take this occasion to remind Senators that they must always address the Chair. It is impossible to protect the rights of Senators in discussion unless they do. The Chair cannot enforce the rules if Senators rise and indulge in colloquies here without addressing the Chair, which is against the rule. The Chair announces this now, and hopes it will be remembered by Senators and applied to all.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, so far as the Senator from Connecticut is concerned, he accepts the rebuke. It was merited. Now will the honorable Senator from Maine permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. With great pleasure.

Mr. EATON. I know that my honorable friend from Maine does not intend to misrepresent me. What I said was that this board were issuing bonds when they knew that the House of Representatives had passed a bill that they should issue no more bonds. That was a part of that bill. That was true; nobody will deny it. The record will not deny it; the houorable Senator from Maine will not deny it. Then, upon information which I received from a reliable source, I said that in my judgment it was performed by not a majority of that board, and that it was done after they had passed a resolution not to do this thing. In that I was mistaken, and I said I regretted that I had made a statement of that kind, because as an honorable man I do not desire to misrepresent anybody and I do not intend to be misrepresented by any person.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no disposition to involve my honorable friend in any inconsistency or misapprehension or misunderstanding of the facts; but I did understand, and I understand now, that, after the amendment of the honorable Senator from Connecticut had been submitted, the Senate were put in possession of the facts upon that subject which led the Senator to regret that a misapprehension had been entertained in the Senate. At any rate the proposition which the Senator had submitted was regarded as of little or no consequence, not a material matter in the bill. So much was said; and, on a suggestion of the Senator from Ohio that he would move a reconsideration of it, it was said "that can be taken care of in the committee of conference, and therefore it is not worth while to touch it." The Senate were anxious to get the bill out of the way, and so it was passed in that way, and so the committee of conference regarded it.

Now, Mr. President, just one word more, and then, so far as I have anything to say or do with this bill, I intend to dismiss it. A single remark fell from my honorable friend from Connecticut in regard to the constitution of this committee of conference, that it was not in harmony with the majority of the Senate. I do not understand what the Senator means when he makes that statement.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield?
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. With great pleasure.
Mr. EATON. 1t is possible that in my ignorance of parliamentary usages I made a very great mistake, and if I did I hope I shall be corrected; but what I said was that, in all legislative bodies that I knew anything about, either in this or any other civilized community, when a committee of conference was ordered, a majority of the committee was taken from a majority of the vote; not from the majority of the body, but a majority of the vote in the body. I know of no other rule. If the Senator from Maine does, I beg him to tell what other rule there is

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Maine agrees entirely, and replies to his honorable friend from Connecticut that this comand replies to his honorable Friend From Connecticut that this committee was constituted strictly in harmony with that parliamentary rule. Every member of the committee voted for the bill. I had the honor to criticise some of the amendments, I admit; but all the members of the committee of conference voted for the bill. If any exception can be taken to the committee it must be in the personnel of the committee. On parliamentary grounds the Chair was right in the announcement of the committee; and besides, if it were not so, the majority of the Senate have no reason to complain; because, as I have before said, with one single exception, and that an immaterial one, this report is in harmony with the bill as passed by the Senate. The Senate therefore have no reason to complain of the action of the committee, I submit, when they consider that it was in a conference, and in a conference there are propositions to take as well as to give.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps, Mr. President, it is rather unnecessary to talk about so small a matter, but I should like to get my difficulties removed, if I can, so that I can vote for this conference report. I am pointed by the Senator from California to the law that refers to the compensation of the members of this board of audit, and the Senator from California must be patient with me, for it is only experience and practice that make perfect, and it may be some time before I can keep up in the construction of this statute. I will make haste as fast as I can. The Senator says, and the Senator from New Jersey agrees with him, that the compensation for the services of this board of

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will my friend permit me? I think that there is an error that my friend from Massachusetts falls into. The statute does not provide that it shall be $2,000 salary or compensation per annum at all.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that, but I was—
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The whole object of that law was a temporary act; and this board of audit, as I understand it, receive $2,000 for the service they perform; and therefore I do not see how they can receive anything more, whether they are suspended or not.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator has made my speech so much better than I could make it myself that it almost renders it unnecessary for me to say anything.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator is perfectly welcome to any service I can render him.

Mr. DAWES. It would be so, if it had not been for the trouble which the construction of this statute by the commissioners has always led me into from the beginning. I had the honor to say to the Senate some time ago that it was a temporary act, designed for a temporary purpose; but I was met by the Senator from New Jersey at that time, and by others, with a very different construction. I was going to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from California to the phraseology of this law. It is:

Each of the said officers constituting said board shall be paid the sum of  $\S 2,000$  for his services under this act.

That is a gross sum. I should suppose that would be the natural construction; but then I am led into difficulty when I read how it has been construed by the commissioners; and I ask the attention of the Senator from California and of the Senator from New Jersey to the report of the commissioners for the year 1875, on page 198, in which they report their expenditures under the head of "board of audit." This is for this board of audit for the year 1875:

Compensation of members

That is, the members of the board of audit, I suppose-

It is evident that the ordinary language of this statute has undergone a construction that I do not understand. It is not fair for me to infer that it is not a proper construction by any means, but it is such a construction that led me to be anxious if we suspended this board of audit that by no process whatever could they get $9,260.64 a year as long as they were suspended. That was my anxiety. The sum total provided in the law for all they were to do was, as the Sensum total provided in the law for all they were to do was, as the Senator from New Jersey has auticipated me in saying, $2,000 apiece for two of them. If I may be allowed in the Senate the word, they were to have for the "job" $2,000 apiece, to wit, $4,000. They received during the year 1875 for compensation of the members—two members—$9,260.64; for compensation of clerks and accountants $34,100.73, and contingent expenses $1,978.27. Total for board of audit during the year 1875, $45,339.64. I suppose that something is the matter with me about this thing; I do not understand it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate

WEDNESDAY, February 16, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HEIRS OF THOMAS B. CROSBY.

Mr. TEESE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2136) for the relief of the heirs of Thomas B. Crosby; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSPORTATION OF MAILS BY BAILROADS.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2137) fixing the rate of compensation of railroad companies for transporting the United States mails; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I think this bill should have gone to the Commit-tee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, as it fixes compensation for carrying the mails.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman introducing the bill has informed the Chair that it relates to the amounts of appropriation; and the Committee on Appropriations desire to examine it. It may hereafter be referred to the other committee.
Mr. CONGER. All right.

A. L. SHOTWELL.

Mr. DURHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2138) for the relief of A. L. Shotwell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ADA L. HARRISON.

Mr. POTTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2139) granting a pension to Ada L. Harrison, minor child of Samuel Harrison, deceased, late a private in Company I, Eighty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

at the present time a bill declaring Cheboygan, in the State of Michigan, a port of delivery.

The bill was read for information. It provides that Cheboygan, in the collection district of Michigan, be declared a port of delivery instead of Duncan City, and that the office of deputy collector, now located at Duncan City, be removed to Cheboygan.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think this bill had better go to a committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. It should go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRADLEY. If gentlemen will allow me one word—

The SPEAKER. There being objection, the bill cannot be received.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to the reference of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. This bill proposes a change of location of only a mile or two, in consequence of the opening of a new harbor.

Mr. GARFIELD. If that is all, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CONGER. The bill makes no new office. It merely changes the location to within a short distance of the present location.

Mr. REAGAN. I think the bill ought to go to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]

WILLIAM HARPER, JR.

Mr. MacDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2141) for the relief of William Harper, jr., first lieutenant Sixth United States Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON WAR DEPARTMENT EXPENDITURES.

Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved. That the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be authorized to employ a clerk at a rate of compensation not exceeding $5 per diem.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CROUNSE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, respectfully directed to furnish this House with a copy of the report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad for the year 1875.

DEFALCATIONS IN INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. STENGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House with a list of all persons connected with the Department of Internal Revenue who have been in default to the Government of the United States since the 4th day of March, A. D. 1869; the amount of the defalcation in each case; the amount afterward collected, and whether paid by the defaulters or their sureties; the cases in which such defaulters or their sureties, or both, have been discharged from liability to the Government for the unpaid balances of their defalcations; the number and names of those defaulters prosecuted to conviction; the number and names of those pardoned; the number and names of such defaulting officers who are still in Government employ; the number and names of those who were kept in Government employ after their defalcations were ascertained, with the length of time they were so kept; together with the aggregate of defalcations since the date mentioned.

HOUSE EMPLOYÉS SUPERSEDED.

Mr. WADDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am requested to ask unanimous consent for the introduction of the following resolution and to move its reference to the Committee of Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House a sum equal to one month's pay to such persons in the service of the House of Representatives at the opening of the present session as may be, or have been, superseded or discharged from such service during the present or previous to the commencement of the next session without fault on their part.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the introduction of the resolution unless it be for reference to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask to introduce it for reference to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of Accounts.

DEFACEMENT OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to introduce for adoption a resolution which I think will meet with the approval of the House. My attention has been called to the fact that our beautiful Capitol building is likely to be much defaced by the use of soft coal, and I think, unless something is done before the winter is over, we will find its exterior blackened. I offer the following resolution in the hope that may be prevented.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to take measures to prevent the burning of soft coal in the Capitol building.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

L'ANSE AND VIEU DE SERT BANDS OF LAKE SUPERIOR.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill (H. R. No. 2142) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to invest in the bonds of the United States the unexpended balance of the money appropriated to the L'Anse and Vieu de Sert bands of Lake Superior, appropriated to the L'Anse and Vieu de Sert bands of Lake Superior, and to ask that it be considered at this time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to invest in the bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate not to exceed 5 per cent. per aunum the unexpended balance, together with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per aunum from the 22d day of June, 1874, of the money appropriated to the L'Anse and Vieu de Sert bands of Chippewas of Lake Superior, under the provisions of an act entitled

"An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years end-ing June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes," approved June 22, A. D. 1874, the principal sum and interest thereon to be expended as provided in said act.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this bill come from any committee?

Mr. HUBBELL. There is an unexpended balance of $20,000 which these Indians desire to have invested as proposed by this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this come from a committee, or is it introduced for the purpose of reference? It seems to me the subject should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I have no objection to the introduction of the bill if it is referred to that committee.

Mr. HUBBELL. The bill should be passed now. It directs the investment of this unexpended balance of $20,000 belonging to these Indians in the bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate not to exceed 5 per cent. per annum. It is an unexpended balance of appropriation to these Indians to be expended under the direction of the President for educational purposes. They wish to have the money invested and receive the interest-on the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no doubt it is all right; but still it should go to the proper committee.

Mr. HUBBELL. If the gentleman objects, of course I will have to agree to the reference of the bill. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not like to object to the bill, but the bill should go to the proper committee.

Mr. HUBBELL. If the gentleman does not like to object, I should like to insist on passing the bill now.

The SPEAKER. Is objection made?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to its being introduced for reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but insist it should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair that is an objection.

Mr. HUBBELL. Let the bill be referred to that committee.

The bill was received, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS TO THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask unanimous consent to present joint resolutions of the Legislature of California, relative to the transfer of Indian affairs to the War Department, and ask that they be read. The Clerk read as follows:

Assembly concurrent resolution No. 24, relative to the transfer of Indian affairs to the War Department.

Resolved by the assembly, (the senate concurring.) That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their influence to obtain the passage of a law at an early day providing for the transferring of the entire management of Indian affairs from the Department of Interior to that of the War Department.

Resolved. That his excellency the governor be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress at as early a day as practicable.

[SEAL.]

G. J. CARPENTER,

G. J. CARPENTER, Speaker of the Assembly. B. F. TUTTLE, President of the Senate pro tempore.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move those resolutions be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall call for the regular order of business.
Mr. SEELYE. I object to the reference of those resolutions to the Committee on Military Affairs. I think they should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I have moved the reference to the Committee on Military Affairs because on yesterday the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cook] reported a bill from that committee in relation to this very

Mr. LUTTRELL. I am not particular as to which committee the resolution shall go to. If the gentleman from Massachusetts so desires, I am willing that the Committee on Indian Affairs shall have the benefit of it.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair the question naturally belongs to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the resolution is

Mr. LUTTRELL. I acquiesce, of course, in the ruling of the Chair. POST TRADERS.

Mr. CLYMER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Secretary of War be requested to inform this House of the names, residences, and dates of appointment of the several post traders of the several trading establishments, and the place at which each one is trading. And also what changes, if any, in the prices of goods, wares, merchandise, or supplies, of every sort and description whatever, as fixed by the post or other council of administration, has been made, and by whom and by what authority.

CHANGE OF NAME OF SCHOONER.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. No. 1384) to change the name of the schooner Turner and Keller, of Oswego, New York, to that of Falmouth, for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill, which was read, provides that the owners of the schooner Turner and Keller, of Oswego, New York, have authority to change the name of the said schooner to Falmouth, and by which name said schooner shall be hereafter known and registered.

Mr. HARRISON. If there is any report from the committee I should like to have it read.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to make a single statement.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it a report from the committee?
Mr. DUNNELL. There is a report. The bill is unanimously reported by the Committee on Commerce. There are two schooners built by the same party of similar name, and of like tonnage and like masts. And their similarity has led frequently to the damage of the owners of each in consequence of one schooner getting a cargo intended for the other schooner.

Mr. FAULKNER. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at seventeen minutes to one o'clock, and reports from committees of a public nature are in or-The call rests with the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CUTTING OF TIMBER ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. BOONE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1297) prohibiting the cutting of pine timber on any Indian reservation or lands to which the Indian title or right of occupancy has not been extinguished.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time

The bill was read. It provides that it shall not be lawful for any agent or officer of this Government, unless especially authorized thereunto by act of Congress, to sell, or authorize the sale, or the cutting or removal of any pine timber on any Indian reservation or from any lands to which the Indian title or right of occupancy has not been extingnished.

It provides in its second section that it shall not be lawful for any person to cut or remove from any such reservation or lands any pine timber thereon, or remove therefrom any logs or lumber cut or manufactured from timber which grew thereon.

It provides in its third section that all sales or transfers and all on tracts relating to or concerning any transfer of any logs, timber, or lumber cut or manufactured from pine timber taken from any such reservations or lands are thereby declared null and void, unless the same shall be authorized by special act of Congress.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman who reported the bill why its operation is limited to pine timber; why it cannot be extended to all timber?

extended to all timber?

Mr. BOONE. It is only a matter of conjecture with me as to what the reason for this limitation may have been on the part of the gentleman who introduced the bill. I suppose it is a fact that the pine timber on those reservations is very valuable and scarce, and that depredations are being committed on that kind of timber particularly. I suppose it was for that reason that the operation of the bill was con-suppose it was for that reason that the operation of the bill was confined to pine timber. I presume the committee would have no objection to making it apply to all kinds of timber.

Mr. REAGAN. If no substantial reason can be given why the bill should not apply to all kinds of timber, I propose an amendment that the word "pine" be struck out wherever it occurs, so that the provisions of the bill shall apply to the cutting and carrying away of all kinds of timber.

Mr. BOONE. The committee will accept the amendment. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the bill as it is proposed to be amended.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was again read.

Mr. NORTON. I desire to make an inquiry as to the effect of this bill, if passed, on certain Indian reservations in the district which I represent in the State of New York. There are two Indian reserva-tions within that district to which the Indian right of occupancy is not extinguished, but the title to which is in a certain company, and in no respect in the United States. This is a company known as the Ogden Company, who own the pre-emption right, and have heretofore, within my recollection, for many years, endeavored to prevent the Indians having the right to transfer or sell the timber on that reservation. The courts have decided that the Indians have the right. The Government of the United States have no interest or right in it, but the title, when extinguished, belongs to a company known as the Ogden Company. The inquiry I desire to make is whether, if the bill is passed, it works as an estoppel to the right of the Indians to sell timber from that reservation?

Mr. CONGER. Where is it?
Mr. NORTON. In Cattaraugus County, New York.
Mr. BOONE. I understand the object of the bill simply to be to prevent the unnecessary waste and consumption of timber on the Indian lands to which the Indian titles have not been extinguished. I suppose it does not apply to the reasonable use of timber for the support of the Indians, or to aid them in building houses, or to do anything else which is necessary in their farming operations; and I suppose the object of the bill is simply to prevent speculation in the timber and the unnecessary destruction of timber.

Mr. NORTON. I understand the object of the bill to be for the purpose of protecting timber in which the United States would have an interest when the Indian title was extinguished. In the case of the reservations of which I speak the United States has no interest whatever. I would therefore like to propose an amendment to the bill excluding from its provisions these two reservations.

Mr. REAGAN. I have not been connected with the examination of this bill, but, if I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. Nor-ton] aright, he states that there are Indian reservations in which the title of the reservation belongs either to the Indians themselves or to private parties, and in which the United States has no interest. Is that so?

Mr. NORTON. That is so.

Mr. REAGAN. I think a subject of that sort requires more consideration than can be given to it on an amendment. It appears that there are reservations for the benefit of Indians in which the Government has no interest or in which the reversionary interest is in somebody outside of the United States, and the property right, the eminent domain, seems to have passed from the Government. Now, that is a matter worthy of consideration.

Mr. NORTON. It results from an old arrangement between the States of New York and Massachusetts. The State of Massachusetts claimed a portion of territory which originally belonged to New York. The matter was settled by granting to Massachusetts certain territory over which the State of New York had jurisdiction, and the title finally passed into the hands of a company by a contract with the Indians, the Indians retaining the right of occupation, and the Government having no interest in it whatever.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I would suggest to the gentlemen of the Commit-tee on Indian Affairs, while I agree entirely with the purpose of the bill, that, as a matter of fact, under this bill the Indians cannot con-

mr. NORTON. That is what I desire to prevent. I think it would be better to re-refer the bill to the committee.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I think it ought to be recommitted.

Mr. JACOBS. There are in the Puget Sound district in Washington Territory, or rather in the western portion of Washington Territory, which is a heavily timbered region, some eight or ten Indian reservations. These reservations are principally, I may say, heavily timbered lands. The practice heretofore has been on the part of the Indians, in order to sustain themselves, to carry on logging operations upon their reservations, cutting timber and selling it to the different milling establishments on the sound. The Supreme Court of the United States has recently rendered a decision denying to a considerable extent the right of these Indians to cut the timber upon the reservations for any purpose except for purposes of agriculture. Now, then, if this bill should pass, these Indians would be without the means of support, and the agents having charge of these Indians on different parts of the Sound are very anxious that the Indians, in order that they may have the means of supporting themselves, shall have the right to some extent of logging upon their reservations.

Mr. REAGAN. When I proposed my amendment to the bill I understood, from the reading of the bill, that the object of it was to prevent persons outside from depredating on the timber on the Indian reservations. It seems, from the explanation made, that the bill has a different purpose; that it is designed to prevent the Indians from depredating on the timber on the reservations as well as others. If that be true, it requires consideration of the nature of the rights of the Indians. Upon that question I do not propose to enter but it dians. Upon that question I do not propose to enter, but it ought to be carefully considered, so as to see that this bill does not take away any existing rights of the Indians.

What I had in view, however, was the preventing of depredations on the timber on Indian reservations by persons not on the reserva-tions. The other question as to the rights of the Indians involves the consideration of what their rights are, or whether it is the intention of the House or within their legislative power to change the rights of these people if they have the right vested in them by the laws. It may be a very serious question whether otherwise than by judicial decision they can be divested of those rights, and I call attention to that point.

Mr. PARSONS. We should like to be informed as to the facts upon which the conclusion of the committee is based, and I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. There is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. BOONE. I think, Mr. Speaker, that a careful reading of the bill will satisfy any gentleman not only as to the intention but the effect of the bill. The intention of the bill is clearly to prevent the unnecessary destruction of timber on the Indian reservations not only by persons who do not live on the reservations and are not Indians, but the Indians themselves, and to prevent them from entering into any combination by which the timber on the reservations shall be destroyed. The purpose of the bill is not only to prevent other persons from cutting timber on the reservations, but to prevent the Indians themselves from doing so. Otherwise the Indians would have the privilege of destroying the timber on their reservations by combinations with parties outside, and of course if the Government has any reversionary in-

Now, it may be that the phraseology of the bill is perhaps a little indefinite and not very well arranged, but the intention of the bill is simply to prevent all persons, Indians and others, from unnecessary destruction of timber,

Mr. MAGINNIS. I will ask the gentleman, in case he passes this law, what will he do for the benefit of the Indians, a large number of whom living on the rivers make a living by cutting and selling wood to steamboats?

Mr. BOONE. I suppose that question is easily answered. I do not think it is the intention of the Government to allow the Indians to waste all the valuable timber upon their reservations; and I do not understand the bill to prohibit them from using such quantities of timber as shall be necessary to the full enjoyment of all the rights they have by virtue of their occupancy of the land.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Not to waste it; but they do not want to be

Mr. BOONE. I suppose the operation of this bill would not prevent the Indians from selling cord-wood to a steamboat, but it would prevent them from rafting off the valuable timber on the reservation.

Mr. MAGINNIS. They should be allowed to do that, the same as any one else

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BOONE,] who has charge of this bill, whether the wording of the second section is not so absolute as to preclude any person from cutting timber for any purpose upon an Indian reservation? It reads:

That it shall not be lawful for any person to cut or remove from any such reservation or land any timber thereon, or remove therefrom any log or lumber cut or manufactured from timber which grew thereon.

There is no reservation of any right to the Indians to cut from these reservations timber for necessary use, for agricultural purposes, or for household purposes. There is no reservation at all to these Indians, who live and subsist from cutting timber on some of these lands, of any right to cut timber, the selling of which may be their only means of subsistence. It seems to me that the second section of this bill is so absolute in its terms that it will prohibit the cut

Mr. CONGER. I wish to add one word to what has been said.

Many of these reservations consist alone of timber lands, and efforts must be made to induce the Indians to clear these lands and cultivate farms, as I know is being done in some portions of the Northwest. In my judgment this bill, if it shall become a law, would prevent their cutting down any timber, even for the purpose of clearing the land. At any rate, it would prevent them from selling any such wood or logs to any one else. I think the bill should be recommitted, in order to preserve these rights of the Indians necessary for their subsistence and support, so as to enable them to clear their farms for purposes of civilization.

Mr. BOONE. In order to avoid further difficulty and to satisfy every gentleman, as I am satisfied the object of the bill is a good one and as I do not desire to endanger its passage, I will move, in order to have an opportunity to correct the particular phraseology and to meet the objections which have been made, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FORT. I wish to submit an amendment to the bill that it may go with it to the committee. The last clause of the first section is so sweeping that I desire to amend by adding the following:

Provided. That the provisions of this act shall not be construed to apply to the Indian Territory in any respect.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word within the hearing of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Boone] before the bill is recommitted. I wish to call his attention to the question of the power of Congress to affect by law the rights of the Indians in their reservations acquired under treaty stipulations and by contract with the sovereign authority of this Government. This certainly involves a question of some gravity as to how far we can by legislation of Congress affect the rights of Indians acquired by treaty stipulations.

The bill, with the pending amendment, was recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

NANCY W. THOMPSON.

Mr. SCALES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the memorial of Nancy W. Thompson, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

MIAMI INDIANS OF KANSAS.

Mr. VAN VORHES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, upon the consolida-tion of the Miami Indians of Kansas with the confederated bands of Peoria, Piankeshaw, Kaskaskia, and Wea Indians of the Indian Territory, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS P. MADDEN.

Mr. SEELYE, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 942) for the relief of Thomas P. Madden, assignee of R. K. Dodge.

Mr. STEELE. Does this involve the question of the liability of the Government for Indian depredations? If it does, I desire that it may go to the Committee of the Whole for consideration,

Mr. SEELYE. It does not relate to that matter at all. The bill was laid upon the table.

EXTENDING TIME FOR ADDITIONAL BOUNTY.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 525) to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, which expired, by limitation, on January 30, 1875, until March 4,

The bill provides that the time for filing claims for additional bounty The bill provides that the time for hing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, and which expired by limitation on the 30th day of January, 1875, shall be revived and extended until the 4th day of March, 1877; and that all claims for such bounty filed in the proper Department after the 30th day of January, 1875, and before the passage of the act, shall be, and the same are thereby, declared to have been filed in due time, and shall be considered and decided without sections. refiling.

The amendments reported from the Committee on Military Affairs were to strike out the words "4th of March" wherever they occur in the bill and title, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "1st of July," so as to extend the time to July 1, 1877.

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. FORT. I would like to ask the gentleman what good reason there is for limiting the time at all in which applications for bounty may be made? If a party entitled to bounty is willing to allow the Government to use his money for years and years, why should he not be allowed to apply at any time and receive his bounty?

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I can say to the gentleman that I see no good reason for the limitation; but it has been the policy of the Government to fix such a limit. It has now been extended two or three

But because the practice has always been wrong there

Mr. FORT. But because the practice has always been wrong there is no reason why we should continue in wrong.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. We think that if the time be extended till July 1, 1877, as proposed in this bill, it will be sufficient for those who have not had an opportunity to file their claims.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman yield for a motion to amend by striking out the limit altogether?

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I would rather not, as I am acting under

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I would rather not, as I am acting under the instructions of the committee.

Mr. BANNING. We are merely following the example which has been set us by Congresses of the gentleman's own friends.

Mr. DE BOLT. The original act was passed in 1866, and the time has been twice extended by republican Congresses.

Mr. FORT. I would like to hear some good reason why the limit should ever have been applied.

should ever have been applied.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have asked that question very often.

Mr. DE BOLT. I suppose the object was to hurry up parties to apply for their bounties.

Mr. FORT. I should think the Government ought not to complain of their delaying the presentation of their claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. When the two previous bills passed I asked the same question which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] now asks, and I tried my best to get the limitation removed in both instances but the House adhered firmly to the policy of limitation. stances, but the House adhered firmly to the policy of limitation, and of course at this late day it is scarcely desirable to change the policy which has been adhered to with so much pertinacity hereto-

Mr. FORT. As the gentleman having charge of the bill declines to yield for an amendment, I submit whether this bill ought not first to go to the Committee of the Whole, where there will be opportunity to move amendments.

to go to the Committee of the Whole, where there will be opportunity to move amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is rather late for that point of order.

Mr. FORT. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this bill must first be considered in the Committee of the Whole, where we can have an opportunity to propose amendments. I make that point of order.

The SPEAKER. Amendments are in order here.

Mr. FORT. But the gentleman in charge of the bill refuses to yield for any amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to offer an amendment. The bill has not yet been ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; therefore it is now amendable.

Mr. FORT. I am glad to know it. I move then to strike out the words fixing the limitation of time.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman insists on the point of order that the bill should first be considered in the Committee of the Whole, the Chair will rule upon it. He desires, however, to suggest that as to a very large class of bills, which might be sent to the Committee of the Whole upon a point of order, business is much facilitated and much time saved by their consideration in the House.

Mr. FORT. I am aware of that, and I do not wish to do anything that may appear hostile to the bill. Therefore I prefer to submit my amendment here.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that at any rate the point of order cannot be raised after the consideration of the bill has proceeded so far.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that at any rate the point of order cannot be raised after the consideration of the bill has proceeded so far.

The SPEAKER. The suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana is very proper.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman must see that to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole would defeat it.

Mr. FORT. I do not wish to press the point of order if we can have an opportunity for amendment in the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill is now amendable, if the gentleman will

The SPEAKER. The bill is now amendable, if the gentleman will send up his proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out "1877" and inserting "1880." The bill now fixes July 1, 1877, as the limit. My amendment will allow quite a long period in which these claims can be filed.

Mr. FORT. I prefer to strike out the whole limitation. I move to amend by striking out after the word "extended" these words, "until the 1st day of July, 1877." This will leave the act without any limit as to time

Mr. MacDOUGALL. There ought to be some limit.
Mr. FORT. No, sir; I do not want any limit.
Mr. HOLMAN. The object of the gentleman will certainly be accomplished by extending the time to the 1st of July, 1880. Hereto-fore the extension has never exceeded two years. We now propose to extend the time for this very long period.

Mr. FORT. Well, I submit my motion to amend, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] can submit his as an amendment to my motion.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. Fort, there were—ayes 8, noes 63; no quorum voting.

Mr. FORT. I insist on a further count. I do not think the House understands the proposition.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FORT and Mr. HOLMAN were ap-

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I rise to a parliamentary question. I understand that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] is to amend the original text which the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Fort] proposes to strike out. I submit that we ought first to act on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, so that the original text may be perfected before the question is taken on striking out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The House divided; and the tellers reported-ayes 41, noes 95.

So the amendment of Mr. FORT was not agreed to. Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for a vote now on my amendment extending the time to 1880. Mr. BANNING. I will now call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I am willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot accept it, as this comes as report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. Holman's amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time,

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

SALE-OF ARSENAL AT STONINGTON, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. TERRY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2143) for the sale of the arsenal and lot at Stonington, Connecticut; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to sell for cash, after such advertisement as he may deem necessary, by public auction, or by inviting proposals for the purchase thereof, and in either case to the highest responsible bidder, a certain lot and parneither case to the highest responsible blader, a certain lot and parcel of land, with the buildings thereon, in the town of Stonington, Connecticut, belonging to the United States, formerly used for arsenal purposes; and the Secretary of War is empowered and required, on receiving the purchase-money in full, to execute the necessary deeds for such property to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, conveying all the right, title, and interest of the United States thereon.

The second section provides that the proceeds of such sale after the right, title, and interest of the United States thereon.

The second section provides that the proceeds of such sale, after paying the necessary expenses thereof, shall, upon the receipt of the same, be paid by the Secretary of War into the Treasury.

Mr. TERRY. I move the bill be put upon its passage. This is an original bill prepared and reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, the passage of which is unanimously recommended by the committee, and it is also recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the gentleman from Virginia why he provides the sale shall be for cash, instead of giving the Secretary of War the discretion to give reasonable time? These are times when cash sales are very difficult to make, and if no good reason can be given why it should be done I would offer an amendment after the word "cash" to insert the words "or on such time as the Secretary may deem proper."

deem proper."

Mr. TERRY. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that this It is a very small piece of property, and is scarcely worth that trouble. It is a little building erected by the Government in 1812 for the purpose of an arsenal, and has not been used now for forty or fifty years by the Government.

Mr. HARRISON. The explanation is entirely satisfactory.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the PUBLIC PROPERTY AT SACKETT'S HARBOR, NEW YORK.

Mr. BURLEIGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1074) providing for the repair and preservation of public property at Sackett's Harbor, New York, with the recommendation that it do pass; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

NORTH GERMAN NATURALIZATION TREATY.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, instructing it to inquire into and report upon the expediency atives, instructing it to inquire into and report upon the expediency of giving to the German Empire the notice required by the fifth article of the treaty with the North German Confederation for the termination of said treaty, or so much thereof and the protocol as relates to citizens of the United States, their renunciation of naturalization and their political condition in Germany, to submit an adverse report in writing against the expediency at this time of giving the notice referred to, and to move that it be laid upon the table and ordered to be writted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I have prepared some remarks on this question, and not wishing to detain the House, I will ask that I have leave to print them in the RECORD as part of the debates.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. Speaker, the resolution now pending from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and to which the assent of this House is asked, does not absolutely reject the proposition of the genreport expresses the very decided opinion that the operation of that treaty has been beneficial to the naturalized German citizen. It also concedes the fact that there are alleged ambignities and omissions in that treaty which are well worthy of the negotiations now pending between the two governments. But it assumes that the treaty was an important diplomatic triumph upon our part which ought not to be hastily or unwisely surrendered. And especially looking to the fact that we have nearly two years yet before us within which this notice may be given; that negotiations are pending between the two governments which may rectify any existing deficiencies, we think it better to await the result of these negotiations, as another session of Congress will intervene in full time to give the notice required by the treaty, if in the judgment of Congress any such notice should then be deemed proper.

I have had no opportunity of learning the objections to the exist-ing treaty with the German Empire which have dictated this resolution. But I am sure those objections cannot be very serious. to me, Mr. Speaker, some wide-spread error must be pervading the minds of the German population of this country, if there be any prejudice against this treaty. It seems to me that every German naturalized citizen in this country should rejoice in the existence of such a compact as that which now exists between this country and the country of his birth. I am unable to comprehend how any German subject emigrating to this country, and desiring honestly and bona fide to become one of our citizens, and to enjoy the advantage of revisiting his native country for temporary purposes, can be opposed to this treaty. But I can well imagine how those who emigrate here for the false and fraudulent purpose of acquiring our citizenship, and then to return to their native country with a view to their permanent residence there, thus evading the obligations which they owe both to their native and adopted country, should find fault with its provisions.

It is not in the power of any gentleman to place me in any attitude of hostility or even of indifference to the rights of our naturalized citizens. I represent a large German element in my constituency. I have no fear that they will misunderstand my course on this subject. This is not the first time that I have stood forward to vindicate the rights of our naturalized citizens. When I arrived in Paris in the early part of 1860 that subject was engaging the earnest consideration of our own and the imperial government. Two or three arrests were made of naturalized American citizens of French birth, and I was called upon to open a correspondence with the imperial government which continued for nearly a year, and which resulted, not only in the release from military service of all the persons arrested, but in the perfect and absolute vindication of the principles and policy of our Government, not only in the courts, but in all the administrative departments of the government. The President of the United States, in his message of December 3, 1860, brought this fact to the notice of the country and of the world, and I believe the rights of American citizens have been as sacredly observed in that country since that day as if they had been secured by a treaty, which at that early day I proposed to negotiate, but in which measure I received no encouragement from the then Secretary of State. I thought then, as I think now, that the rights of our naturalized citizens in foreign countries can best be protected by treaty obligations; and if France, by the liberal and enlightened course which she has pursued upon that sub-ject, is any exception to this general rule, certainly the history of this question in Germany before the ratification of the present treaty can give no assurance that Germany would have proved a like exception to the rule.

An opinion has been expressed that the condition of the naturalized citizen in Germany was better before than since the ratification of this treaty. This to my mind is a most extraordinary assertion. Prussian law of emigration at that time in force of itself renders such a fact impossible. Our entire diplomatic correspondence from 1858, when that subject began to engage the special attention of the two governments, up to 1868, when the treaty was ratified, shows the reverse. During that entire period of ten years the time and labor of our minister at Berlin were almost exclusively occupied in interceding and negotiating with the Prussian government for the relief of our suffering fellow-citizens. Arrests were continually occurring; the grossest indignities were at times heaped on these victims of military that the property of t itary oppression; they were forcibly put into the army and compelled to serve one, two, and even three years before the importunities of our minister could obtain their release: and when granted it was granted as a favor and royal concession, not as a surrender to the just demands of our Government.

Sir, it is difficult to estimate and appreciate the brilliant diplomatic triumph achieved by our Government in the accomplishment of this treaty, unless we refer to the national doctrines held at that time, not only in Prussia but in our own country; for let it be remembered that it was not until five months after the negotiation of this treaty with the North German Confederation that Congress, for the first time in its history, declared the right of expatriation to be a fundamental principle of this Government and announced to the world its determination to protect all naturalized citizens of the United States while in foreign states, whether that foreign state-was the land of their birth or some third power.

What was the recognized American doctrine prior, certainly, to 1860? It was that, if a foreigner naturalized in this country returned to the land of his birth, he thereby forfeited the protection of this Government and became as subject to all the demands of his nato an the demands of his native government upon him as if he had never emigrated and never been naturalized in this country. This doctrine is so repugnant to our present ideas of an acquired nationality under the Constitution and laws of our country, it is so irreconcilable with our advanced ideas of the rights of emigration and expatriation, that I feel in announcing such a proposition I should sustain it by some high authority. All here are familiar with the name of Henry Wheaton, the distinguished writer upon international law, whose works have been translated into every language of Europe, adopted as a text-book in our colleges and universities, and recognized as a standard of authority by statesmen and diplomatists throughout the world. In 1840 he was the minister of the United States to the court of Berlin. In that year he was applied to for his official interference on behalf of one Johann Knock, a Prussian by birth, who at the age of twenty-one had emigrated to the United States and become naturalized here, but having returned to Prussia had been required to do military duty as a Prussian subject. To his application for relief Mr. Wheaton re-

It is not in my power to interfere in the manner you desire. Had you remained in the United States or visited any other foreign country (except Prussia) on your lawful business, you would have been protected by the American authorities, at home and abroad, in the enjoyment of all your rights and privileges as naturalized citizen of the United States. But having returned to the country of your birth, your natice domicil and natural character revert (so long as you remain in the Prussian dominions) and you are bound in all respects to obey the laws exactly as if you had never emigrated.

In like manner, in 1852, the application of a Dr. Gutowski for the intervention of the American minister to protect from military service was rejected on the ground that, as he had voluntarily returned to the country of his birth, the Prussian government had a right to regard him as a subject and so to treat him in all respects. Such were the doctrines announced by Daniel Webster when Secretary of State in 1852 and by Edward Everett in 1853.

William Beach Lawrence, who as a jurist stands second only to Wheaton in ability, learning, and research, in referring to the opinion first quoted from Wheaton, says:

The doctrine thus enunciated was, I have reason to know, the rule of all the instructions from the Department of State, from the commencement of the Government to the one of Secretary Cass.

Such, then, was our recognized American doctrine up to about the time that I was sent as minister to France. Secretary Cass then took a new departure upon this subject, reversed the instructions of all his predecessors, and enabled me, among the earliest communications which I made to the imperial government, to announce in the following language this new exposition of American rights. In my letter to Mr. Thouvenel of the 2d of April, 1860, I felt myself instructed to

The effect which this act of naturalization operates under the laws and Constitution of the United States upon the civil and political status of the foreigner is obvious. From the moment of his naturalization he becomes incorporated as a full member of our political society, possessed of all the rights and immunities of a native born citizen, with the single qualification that he is not eligible to the office of Chief Magistrate of the Republic. With that single exception, he is in every respect and for every purpose an American citizen, upon a footing of perfect equality with the native-born citizen. His allegiance to his native country is by this act severed for-ever. He experiences a new political birth. A broad and impassable line separates him from his native land. Should he return there for temporary purposes of business or pleasure, he goes there an American citizen, with all the privileges and obligations of his new nationality fully impressed upon him.

These doctrines which I was thus instructed to announce as the inflexible conclusions of the American Government were approved by the popular sentiment of this country, and eight years afterward they were incorporated into one of the most important statutes of Congress.

It was fully within the authority of our Government to change its own attitude upon this question, but it was not within the power of our Government to change the laws which for years had taken deep root in Prussia. And, besides, we argued this new principle to some disadvantage in Prussia, when her statesmen and jurists could refer to the opposite doctrine as announced in the capital of her own empire by our Government through two of our own most learned and distinguished representatives.

Let me now for a moment refer to the Prussian doctrine to which that government adhered with such inflexible tenacity up to the formation of that treaty which it is now sought shall be set aside.

The constitutional charter of Prussia acknowledged the right of emigration, but it did so subject to one important qualification. It held that every male child in the kingdom was born with the obligation impressed upon him of performing military service within certain ages, and that any one, no matter what his age, who emigrated without the authority of the government, and up to the period when military service was no longer exacted of him, violated their fundamental law, and did not cease to be a Prussian subject, no matter to what country and the first case to be a rrassal stoject, no matter to what contry he emigrated, nor with what solemnity he attempted to change his nationality by naturalization; and that upon his return to their coun-try he was to be treated as a deserter or refractory, and either fined or imprisoned, or made to serve in the army the period he had evaded or imprisoned, or made to serve in the army the period he had evaded by emigration.

Such was the rigorous and unbending character of Prussian law; such were the doctrines tenaciously, persistently, and obstinately adhered to by that government, which our representative abroad had to encounter prior to the treaty of 1868. Is it surprising, under such circumstances, with the annually increasing German emigration, and the natural return of so many to the land of their birth, that difficulties the last insuling a constant. the natural return of so many to the land of their birth, that difficul-ties should be continually occurring? Can Mr. Bancroft, our then minister, be charged with any exaggeration when in his dispatches to our Government he so painfully describes the condition of the Ger-man naturalized citizen? Is it surprising that he was constantly re-ceiving letters from our adopted citizens asking him to procure special permission for them to return to their native land and visit a dying father or a dying mother? Is it surprising that many an add father father or a dying mother? Is it surprising that many an aged father or mother would journey to the frontier of some adjoining nation to visit a returning son who dared not risk himself within the limits of Sir, this state of things was becoming intolerable. It at length attracted the attention of that eminent and sagacious statesman Count Bismarck when he became minister of foreign affairs in 1865. He very clearly perceived that harmony between the two governments could not be preserved amid this constant conflict between Prussian law and the immunity which we claim for our naturalized citizen under this advanced dectrine of Secretary Cass. He saw that any change in the Prussian law, by any legislative ordinance, was utterly impracticable. Not only was that law the basis of its military sysimpracticable. Not only was that law the basis of its military system, but there existed everywhere throughout the kingdom an unconquerable jealousy of those who sought exemption from the prescribed military service of the country by virtue of their American naturalization. It was to his great and practical mind that we are indebted for the suggestion of a treaty as the only remedy that would obviate the existing evil. He prepared the projet of a treaty, which, although very liberal when compared with the law as it then stood, was not so liberal as the treaty three years afterward negotiated by Mr. Bancroft.

The treaty of 1868 was negotiated; it made an absolute surrender of Prussian law, and yielded a solemn assent to our American doc-

Now, sir, what are the principles incorporated into that treaty of 1868? It recognizes in the broadest terms the natural right of expatriation—a doctrine never before so fully and unconditionally conceded by the German government. It recognizes the free right of emigration and the absolute discharge of every naturalized citizen from all military service not actually due and required of him by some call or demand of the government upon him prior to his emigration. It secures his safe return to Germany for all temporary purposes, with all the rights privileges and exemptions that would be action. It secures his safe return to Germany for all temporary purposes, with all the rights, privileges, and exemptions that would be accorded to a native-born citizen of the United States.

The protection which this treaty gives to the naturalized German citizen is of the highest and most solemn character, and gives to him a guarantee from both governments that his rights shall be fully recognized and defended. It follows as a necessary consequence from this treaty obligation that, if from any false information his rights are harshly invaded or his liberty oppressively abridged, he would have a right to demand compensation for such an infraction of the treaty—a right never before accorded by any government nor claimed treaty—a right never before accorded by any government nor claimed by our own, no matter what may have been the sufferings and priva-tions to which citizens may have been exposed.

With this brief exposition of the leading characteristics of this treaty, and in the known condition of things existing in the absence of such a treaty, it might well excite surprise that any objection could exist against it in the mind of the German naturalized citizen. But it is said that the objection to the treaty is to be found in the provision contained in the fourth article. This provides that

If a German naturalized in America renews his residence in North Germany, without the intent to return to America, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalization in the United States.

Can there be any well-founded objection to a provision like this? Is it not the logical and inevitable conclusion that flows from our own cherished right of expatriation? Shall we claim to extend the protection of our flag and nationality to one who has permanently abandoned our country and virtually renounced all allegiance whatever to our Government?

But it is said that the treaty is harsh in fixing two years as the period from which the renunciation of his adopted citizenship may be inferred. This same period of two years is in six of our other naturalization treaties, and no complaint has been made from Denmark, from Sweden and Norway, and Mexico that the time is too short. Two years of continuous residence one might suppose would be long enough for any of the temporary purposes of business, health, or pleasure. Our forefathers in their legislation more than half acentury ago so thought, for the act of Congress of the 27th of March, 1804, denationalizes any American vessel the owner of which, in whole or in part, if a naturalized citizen, shall reside more than a year in the country in which he originated, or more than two years in any foreign country. If the terms of the treaty were imperative there might possibly be some ground of complaint, but by the terms of the treaty the two years ground of complaint, but by the terms of the treaty the two years afford only a presumption liable to be repelled and rebutted by proper explanations; and in nothing have the delicacy and good faith of the German government been more apparent than in the execution of this particular provision of the treaty. If the residence of the naturalized German citizen is protracted beyond two years he is liable to be called on for an explanation of that fact. If the explanation presents any reasonable ground for procrastination, if it is consistent with the other general facts of his residence, if he is remaining there for the barrelie of his health or te close upon impositions or for the purpose. benefit of his health, or to close up an inheritance, or for the purposes benefit of his health, or to close up an inheritance, or for the purposes of educating his children, or any other like purpose, honestly disclosed, his explanation is accepted and the matter is ended; but if the facts connected with his continued residence indicate that he is there permanently, and that he has falsely and fraudulently obtained citizenship in the United States merely to procure exemption from the duties that devolve upon other subjects of the empire, then he is summoned before the proper tribunals of the country. But even then and under such circumstances no right of exclusive decision rests with the German tribunals or with the German government, but the full right of the American Government to intervene to investigate full right of the American Government to intervene, to investigate, and to determine the facts of the case for itself is conceded by the German government under the treaty.

It is not to be doubted that there is a powerful party in Germany

It is not to be doubted that there is a powerful party in Germany opposed to this existing treaty. Whether its influence will be sufficiently great to cause Germany to terminate this treaty at the expiration of the ten years, I am not sufficiently informed. All must admit that, in making this treaty, we gave no adequate equivalent and that the advantages were wholly on our side. As the foreign minister of Wurtemberg said to Mr. Bancroft when he was subsequently negotiating with him a treaty similar to that which had been made with the North German confederation:

You propose to us a treaty in which you ask that every concession be made to ou and you offer us nothing in return.

The fact is literally so. We gained important advantages without rendering any equivalent. That the German government is now senrendering any equivalent. That the German government is now sensible of this is apparent from the manifest reluctance which it now exhibits, notwithstanding the earnest appeals of our Government, to extend this treaty to those German states now within the German Union, but who formed no part of the North German confederation at the time of our treaty with it. And some idea of the sentiment of Germany may be gathered from a periodical styled in English "The Prussian Annals," and which contained in its May, June, and Angust Prussian Annals," and which contained in its May, June, and August numbers, 1875, articles denunciatory of this German treaty, and with appeals to the German government to terminate it as soon as possible. These articles are said to be from the pen of Dr. Frederick Kapp, a gentleman of unquestioned ability and power as a writer, who passed about twenty-five years in this country as an American citizen, but has returned to his old German citizenship, and who has distinguished himself as one of the bitterest enemies of the United States in all Germany. The following is the opening passage of the first of his three articles:

three articles:

The treaty concluded on the 22d of February, 1868, between the North German Union and the United States determines substantially that henceforth a North German (i. e., at present a German) who, by emigrating, evades military duty, cannot be compelled to fulfill it on his return to Germany, nor in any other manner be molested, if he has been absent at least five years, and during this period has acquired citizenship in the United States.

The treaty was for the American Government the result of negotiations conducted for a series of years with great energy and with still greater skill; a brilliant triumph of its diplomacy which has a most righteons claim to the gratitude of its fellow-citizens instead of unfounded complaints that enough was not gained. For Germany it meant the light-hearted, even joyful surrender of a position legally well-defined and indisputable, with not the slightest equivalent demanded or received; nay more than this, it was, and still is, a premium which the new German Empire sets upon the emigration to the United States of its sons who are liable to Empire sets upon the emigration to the United States of its sons who are hable to military duty.

Fortunately this treaty was concluded only for a period of ten years, so that, by virtue of the fifth article, on the 9th of November, 1877, six months before its expiration, that is, reckoned from the exchange of ratifications, May 9, 1868, notice may be given of its termination. The interest of Germany unequivocally demands the exercise of this right.

It seems to me, then, so far as I have looked into this question, that there are two, and but two, classes of persons who are opposed to the continuance of the present treaty. They are, first, the enemies of the United States in Germany. I do not charge this class as being governed by any improper or unpatriotic feeling; indeed, I might rather class them as the zealons friends of their own country; they see and know that this treaty has operated powerfully as a premium upon emigration from their country, and, feeling that this drain upon their most useful population seriously impairs the strength of the empire, they are disposed to arrest it.

The second class who are hostile to this treaty are those who have emigrated here with no bona fide purpose or intent of contributing to the growth or promoting the advancement of our country, and who remain here only long enough to acquire citizenship in our country, and then expect to return to their native land to live the balance of their lives free from the obligations that would otherwise attach to them as citizens of their original country.

It was to guard against this abuse of our law of naturalization that one of the provisions to which I have before referred was inserted in this treaty. It is they who principally want it terminated, for it opposes an invincible obstacle to the gratification of their selfish views. It is a provision eminently just to the German government, just to

It is a provision eminently just to the German government, just to ourselves, just to that honest class of our naturalized citizens who place a proper value upon American citizenship and are disposed to conform to the true spirit of the treaty.

Whatever is valuable will have its counterfeit. It is therefore not surprising that our naturalization laws should be resorted to for selfish and unworthy purposes. It is indeed a high and glorious privilege to be an American citizen, to feel that you are part and pareel of a great Republic which commands the admiration and respect alike of the civilized and barbarian world. There is not now a power on earth that does not acknowledge our greatness and solicit power on earth that does not acknowledge our greatness and solicit our friendship. More far-reaching than the boasted protection of Roman citizenship, there is not a portion of the earth where the name of this Republic does not assure protection to its citizens. It matters not into what nation or tribe his fate or fortune may carry him, into what gulf or ocean he may wander, he feels, as he contemplates our national flag, that he may say of it in the language of the Psalmist—

If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall Thy hand lead me, and Thy right hand shall hold me.

Sir, it is because I value this great privilege of American citizen-ship that I am unwilling to see it made the instrument of fraud and imposture. If a man becomes an American citizen by adoption, let him show by his residence among us that he values the country that has made him one of its children; let him live here and discharge all of the duties which his country demands of him. If he revisits the country of his origin for the purposes of business or pleasure, let him do so with the intent of return within a reasonable time; but I will never agree to change, modify, or terminate a treaty which is only objectionable because it refuses to recognize as citizens those who abandon our country and virtually renounce our Government.

STATE OF COLORADO.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Territories, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1328) to amend the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal foot-and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875.

The bill, which was read, provides that so much of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875, as reads "and also to vote upon the acceptance or rejection of such constitution as may be formed by said convention," be amended so as to read as follows:

And all who are suchified voters of said Territory under the laws thereof at

And all who are qualified voters of said Territory under the laws thereof at such time as the constitution to be framed shall be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection shall vote upon the question of such ratification or rejection.

The second section provides that section 13 of said act be amended by adding at the end of said section 13 the following:

And if the balance of said legislative appropriations does not amount to the sum of $20,000, then there shall be, and there hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient, with the said unexpended appropriations, to make the sum of $20,000, which shall be used for the purposes aforesaid: Provided, That any money hereby appropriated not necessary for such purposes shall be reconveyed into the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of erder.
The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

In line 13, section 1, between the words "shall" and "vote," insert the words "be entitled to;" so that it will read "shall be entitled to vote upon the question," &c. In line 16, section 2, strike out the word "reconveyed" and insert in lieu thereof the word "covered."

At the end of section 2 add the words "of the United States."

Mr. PATTERSON. I presume the point of order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania would raise is that this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for consideration. So far as that is concerned the point would be well taken, and no one could make an objection to it. But what I want to call the attention of the House to is the fact that to the individuals for whose benefit the second section of the bill is framed it is of the utmost importance that it should receive an early consideration and determination at the hands of this Congress.

The convention is assembled at the present time in the city of Denver, and has been assembled since the 20th of December last, endeavoring to frame a constitution under which it is hoped that the centennial State will add strength, and wealth, and glory to the American Union. This convention is called together under an act of the last Congress, and it is essentially and truly a creature of Congress. Many Congress, and it is essentially and truly a creature of Congress. Many of the members who compose that convention have traveled a distance of five hundred miles over the snowy ranges of the Rocky Mountains; and they have borne their own traveling expenses, which are not light in that country, where great distances have to be traveled on horseback and by stage-coaches. Not only have the members of that convention borne their own traveling expenses, but since the 20th of December they have borne their own living expenses in the city of Denver while engaged in the service of the Government. Not only that sir but they have been conveiled to become personally reonly that, sir, but they have been compelled to become personally responsible for every item of expenditure that enters into that convention, such as the purchase of stationery, and the employment of la-borers, pages, and clerks, and many other expenses that necessarily cluster around a body of that kind.

This convention has no power, under any circumstances, to provide one dollar for its expenses. On the contrary the members of it are there under what is known as the enabling act, under an act of Congress; and Congress, recognizing this fact, attempted to provide a method by which these expenses should be paid; but, on account of circumstances which may hereafter be explained, that intention on the part of Congress has utterly and entirely failed.

This convention, Mr. Speaker, will soon adjourn. The members of the convention are as a rule men in the most moderate circumstances. They cannot well afford to lose their time, and in addition to that to

They cannot well afford to lose their time, and in addition to that to They cannot well alord to lose their time, and in addition to that to pay out of their own pockets the large sums of money which they have necessarily been compelled to pay out on account of the services they are rendering. I was saying this convention will soon adjourn, and it is a question with members of the convention how they shall return to their homes, whether they shall ride or walk, or whether they shall be compelled to impose still longer upon the generosity of their friends at the capital of the Territory and remain there until spring, so that they may reach their homes without the aid of snow-

Now these gentlemen believe, and I believe, that it is the absolute duty of Congress to make the necessary provision for defraying the expenses of this convention. But as to the merits or demerits of the question I do not say one word now. I only ask that this House shall question I do not say one word now. I only ask that this House shall pass upon and determine whether or not it is the duty of Congress to provide for these expenses. So much Congress owes to these men, who are looking to Congress upon this question that they may know what to expect, and how they shall guide themselves in the future. And with that view I yield to the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, who has reported the bill, that he may submit a motion. Mr. RANDALL. I now make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] makes the point of order that this bill, making an appropriation, ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I rose for the purpose of moving to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not in order.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that this bill may be considered.

Mr. FORT. Does not the point of order of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] come too late?

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; I distinctly reserved the point of order. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania made the point of order as soon as the bill was read.

Mr. SOUTHARD. My motion is for the purpose of meeting the point of order that the bill may be considered in Committee of the Whole. Mr. RANDALL. It would not be reached if we went into Committee of the Whole. There is other business there which would take precedence

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to suggest to the House that at two o'clock, which is but a few minutes off, there is a special order assigned for this day, the consideration of the judiciary bill.

Mr. BLAINE. That would not prevent the House going into Committee of the Whole on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. RANDALL. There is other business in Committee of the Whole which would be in the way of this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. It is in the power of a majority in the Committee of the Whole to pass over other business.

Mr. RANDALL. I made the point of order promptly, but yielded for the purpose of hearing the gentleman representing the Territory of Colorado. I now renew it.

The SPEAKER. The point of order, in the judgment of the Chair, does not interfere with the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr.

SOUTHARD,] which is in substance the same as the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He moves, and that is the question before the House, that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The title of the bill was again read.

The question was put; and on a division there were ayes 141, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. Blackburn in the Chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1328) to amend the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved

March 3, 1875.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the committee for a few moments I shall endeavor to explain the object of this bill. At the last session of Congress, as you are all aware, the Territory of Colorado was admitted into the Union under an enabling act. The object of this bill is to amend that enabling act in two particulars only. The first amendment relates to the third section of the enabling act, and to the qualifications of voters upon the ratification of the constitution that may be framed. By the enabling act those persons who were qualified voters on the 3d day of March, 1875, were authorized and entitled to vote both upon the election of delegates to this constitutional convention and upon the ratification of such constitution as may be presented to the people, but by that act this election for the ratification of the constitution cannot take place until July, 1876. There is this difficulty which it is proposed to remedy by this amendment: by the laws of the Territory there is required a six months' residence in order to entitle a citizen to vote, and by the provisions of the enabling act only those could vote for members of the constitutional convention last September who had been six months a resident in the Territory, and unless the law is changed only those voters can vote on the ratification of the constitution next July, or, in other words, it will require a residence in the Territory of twenty months to enable a citizen to vote on the ratification of the constitution. The Committee on Territories are of the unanimous opinion that that distinction ought not to exist. They are well satissied that it arose in an oversight in the passage of the enabling act, and therefore seek to correct it. The amendment proposed here is that those who are legal and qualified voters under the laws of the Territory, that is, who have had a six months' residence theretofore, shall be entitled to vote on the ratification of the constitution in July

The second section relates to an appropriation for the necessary expenses of this convention. By the thirteenth section of the enabling act it was provided that any balance of the legislative appropriation for the Territory might be applied to the payment of the members of the constitutional convention, but the act itself postponed the time of the meeting of the convention until a time when the Legislature of the meeting of the convention until a time when the Legislature of the Territory was required by law to assemble, and therefore that provision is rendered inapplicable. In the reason that the money appropriated for legislative expenses is required for that purpose and no provision is left for the payment of the expenses of this convention. The Legislature of the Territory is required to meet biennially under a general law. Two years ago that Legislature met. It was required to meet this winter again, and is now in session. If it did not do so it could not meet until two years from this winter because the law.

so it could not meet until two years from this winter, because the law fixes the sessions biennially and there is no power in the governor of nxes the sessions biennially and there is no power in the governor of Colorado to call the Legislature together at any other or later date. Such a power of the governor exists only in the Territories of Washington, Idaho, and Montana; so that unless the Legislature had met this winter there could be no Legislative Assembly in Colorado for four years, or from 1874 to 1878. There is this further consideration why this appropriation should be made: The constitutional conventions are assembled under the leave and caretime of Constitutional Conventions. tion was assembled under the laws and sanction of Congress. These delegates were elected under a law of Congress and called together at this particular time. . he law of Congress and caned together at this particular time. . he law of Congress provided that they should not meet earlier and that the constitution should not be ratified until July next, so that Congress has called together a constitutional convention and made no provision for the payment of a single dollar of the necessary expenses.

Now suppose Congress does not make provision; how shall they be paid? That is the next question. Manifestly the Legislature of the Territory cannot provide for their payment, and the constitutional convention itself has no power to do it, as is well settled by legal writers on that question. I could sustain this by references, but it is not necessary to read the law on that question. I say, therefore, that the convention is left without the power to appropriate money and left to pay its own expenses. If the matter is remitted to the Legislature of the future State after it shall be organized, if it shall be organized at all, the question will necessarily be deferred for some considerable at all, the question will necessarily be deferred for some considerable time and until the pressing necessity shall have passed. The members of the convention would have to wait the pleasure of the Legislature of the State that may or may not be organized hereafter.

With these considerations the Committee on Territories were unanimously of the opinion that these expenses ought to be paid, but they have put in a proviso that if the $20,000 appropriated prove to be more than sufficient the balance shall be returned to the Treasury of the

I will say this much further before I yield the floor to other gentlemen. It may be asked what are the precedents on this question. There is no precedent against it, and there is no case that I am able to find that is similar to the present case. In the case of Nebraska the same provision was made in the enabling act, applying the balance of the appropriation for legislative expenses to pay those of the constitutional convention, and they were paid because there was a balance sufficient to pay them; but in this case the law provides for the convention and for the ratification of the constitution that it may frame, but by the operation of the act there is no legislative appropriation on hand to pay the expenses. There has been, sir, within my knowledge, no Territory that has been admitted precisely under the same circumstances. I do not mean that other Territories have not same circumstances. I do not mean that other retrieves have not been admitted under enabling acts, because many of them have been so admitted; but they come with State constitutions framed under circumstances different from this case, and the expenses were incurred under circumstances which rendered it possible for them to be paid.

Mr. FORT. I will add one or two additional reasons why this bill

Mr. FORT. I will add one or two additional reasons why this bill ought to pass. In the first place, I can see no good reason why the United States should not pay the expenses of this constitutional convention, when they have universally paid the expenses of territorial Legislatures as well as other expenses pertaining to the Territories. And there is another reason why I think the United States ought to pay these expenses. Congress invited the people of the Territory of Colorado to meet and elect delegates to a constitutional convention; that was done by a law of Congress. It directed those delegates to assemble and frame a form of State government, a constitutional convention; gates to assemble and frame a form of State government, a constitu-tion for the people of that Territory. Those delegates have assembled and are now in session. If perchance the constitution which they are framing should not be adopted by the people of the Territory, if it should fail for any reason to go into effect, then there is no way by which these delegates could be paid. They have been called together by an act of Congress; they have met and are now rendering service. If their work should not be accepted they must return home without

As has been well stated by the chairman, [Mr. Southard,] there is no power in the territorial Legislature to pay the delegates to this convention. All the appropriations which the territorial Legislature may make are of course subordinate to the will of Congress. It occurs to me, therefore, that, there being no real reason why Congress should not pay the expenses of this convention as well as the expenses of the territorial Legislature and for the further reason that this convention is a creature of Congress, called together by its order, the expenses should be paid by the United States. I have no order, the expenses should be paid by the United States. I have no desire to detain the committee further.

Mr.RANDALL. This question whether we shall appropriate money for the payment of the sum asked to this Territory was before the Committee on Appropriations and examined by them. No instance was found where the United States had ever before paid any such expenses to any Territory. There was an instance in the case of Nebraska where Congress permitted the unexpended balances of appropriation due the Territory to be used for the expenses of the constitutional convention. In that instance the convention sat but one day. Now, if the House shall choose to open wider the field of expendi-ture than it has ever before been opened, I shall be content. My duty at least as a member will be performed in having presented the facts to the House. I have sent to the committee-room for a letter from the Treasury Department in support of the statement I have made. Mr. PATTERSON. With the contents of the letter to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has referred, I will take no issue. It is true that so far as prior legislation is concerned no appropriation in this form has before been made by Congress for defraying the expenses of the constitutional conventions of the Territories. But I will also say that there is no case on record similar to the case of Colorado.

It is as easy to prove that the Congress which passed the enabling act intended that the United States should bear these expenses as it is to prove that members of this House are now occupying their seats. I hold in my hand the enabling act for the admission of Colorado into the Union as a State as it passed the last Congress. I will read section 13 of that bill and will then call the attention of the committee to the history of legislation with reference to the bill.

Sec. 13. That any balance of the appropriation for the legislative expenses of said Territory remaining unexpended shall be applied to and used for defraying the expenses of said convention and for the payment of the members thereof under the same rules and regulations and rates as are now provided by law for the payment of the territorial Legislature.

Thus it will be seen that the Congress which passed the enabling Thus it will be seen that the Congress which passed the enabling act recognized the duty of the United States to pay the members of that convention, who could look only to Congress for pay, and to no other source. Congress attempted to provide the fund for their payment. What was it? The unexpended legislative appropriation for the Territory of Colorado. The Congress that passed that bill also provided in a separate act that the sum of $22,000 should be appropriated for the legislative expenses of the Territory.

Under the enabling act as it originally passed the House the constitution of Colorado and all the State machinery could have been stitution of Colorado and all the State machinery could have been put in operation within ninety days from the 3d of March last. Had the bill passed the Senate and become a law as it originally passed the House, the $22,000 appropriated for legislative expenses would have been available for the expenses of this convention. But when the bill went to the Senate, for some reason unknown to me, that body tacked on certain amendments. One of those amendments in effect provided that Colorado should not be admitted as a State into the Union until July next. What was the result of that amendment? Since our territorial Legislature had to meet last January, under the law, it did meet and the appropriation of $22,000 was thereby consumed.

The affairs of Colorado demanded that the Legislature should meet.

Covering as our Territory does a broad expanse of country, with our immense mining interests at stake, with the problem of water rights and privileges yet unsolved, experimental legislation to a certain extent being almost always necessary in a Territory situated as ours is and with our climatic peculiarities, it was demanded that that Legislature should meet; we could not run the risk of an interval of four years between the meetings of the Legislature. If it had not been for this amendment we would have been a State long before the Legfor this amendment we would have been a State long before the Legislature met; and, as I said before, the money that was appropriated for that body under the express language of this act would have been used for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the convention.

But how was the bill passed with this amendment? Those who were members of the last Congress know that the bill was not brought up in the Senate until the very last days of that Congress. The last week of the session witnessed the passage of the bill by the Senate; and coming back to the House it was passed during the last four or five hours of that body's existence. Neither the members of this body nor of the Senate had in reality time to understand the connection between the amendment and the evident purpose of Congress to defray the expenses of the convention; and consequently these things were overlooked.

Now we are not without a precedent. I hold in my hand a paper which goes to show that the expenses of the constitutional convention of the State of Nebraska were paid by the Government of the United States. Those expenses, it is true, were light. The convention was in session but one day and then adjourned. But every member of that convention was paid his regular per diem and mile-age. The firemen, the pages, the clerks, and all others connected with that convention were paid the remuneration allowed by law out of money that belonged to the Treasury of the United States.

The point is made that this money was paid under the provisions of the act itself, which provided, as our act provides, that unexpended legislative appropriations should be used for that purpose. But, Mr. Chairman, what is the difference? If those legislative appropriations were not used, as a matter of course the balance belonged to the Government; it ought to be in the Treasury of the Government; and if used to defray the expenses of that convention, it was just as much taken out of the Treasury of the Government as if a direct appropriation had been made.

There is one other point to which I desire to call the attention of the House, not as a legal argument, but as an argument to show that I do not come here as the Delegate from Colorado asking for anything unreasonable at the hands of this House. The policy and the uniform action of the Government have been to defray all the expenses of territorial governments, to pay the salaries of judges, governor, secretaries, and all other officers connected with the territorial form of government. The theory was that the Territories were too weak and too poor to pay their own expenses; that the Territories were burdens upon the Government, and that it was an act of charity for the Government to bear those burdens. While that may be true, Mr. Government to bear those burdens. While that may be true, Mr. Chairman, with reference to other Territories, (whether it is true or not I am not prepared to say,) yet I hold in my hand a report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue which shows that the Territory of Colorado has paid into the Treasury of the United States $600,000 more than Congress ever appropriated for its benefit. There is that amount to our credit. We stand in a position unlike that of almost any other Territory: a creditor of the Government instead of a debtor. Is it necessary for me to turn to the figures to prove that I am correct? On page 153 of the report I have just referred to it is shown that the total amount of internal revenue paid to the Government from the Territory of Colorado during the past ten years was $1,227.857.16. the Territory of Colorado during the past ten years was $1,227,857.16, while the average annual expenditures of the United States for the government of that Territory amount to less than $30,000. Thus it appears that in reality Colorado has paid into the Treasury of the United States from eight to nine hundred thousand dollars more than she ever received therefrom.

Now I simply ask this House if it can say that it is right and just to call into existence a body of men, without giving to it the power to raise funds with which its expenses might be met, and at the same time not only require its members to return to their homes without payment for the time lost in behalf of the Government, but also compel each individual to pay out of his own pocket hundreds, perhaps thousands, of dollars expended white clevating the Territory from the position of dependency which the Territories occupy to that of an independent and self-supporting State. Why should those men be put to this large expenditure out of their own means, for the purpose of carrying into effect the will of Congress?

It is plain that the intent of the last Congress was to meet these expenses. Will this Congress be less generous to the people of Colorado than the last Congress intended to be, and would have been but that in the haste of legislation in the last hours of the session the purpose was defeated?

I regret that a gentleman upon my own side of the House, [Mr. RANDALL,] the recognized leader, perhaps, of the party on this side, should be found opposing that which is just and equitable and which no amount of reasoning will ever convince me and my people should not receive the approval of Congress.

Without any State delegation at my back, without any power in this House, ay, without even the right to vote for the bill which I am advocating, I have nothing on which to depend save the generosity of members and the justice of the measure that I espouse. I will not speak further, feeling that I do not mistake in assuming that the sentiments of this House, in favor of the Government bearing every just expenditure, will secure for this bill its approval.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, however, distasteful at times it may be to object to the expenditure of money, yet, when duty compels it, I mean to perform that duty, notwithstanding persuasive language such as we have heard from the Delegate from Colorado, [Mr. Patterson.]

In this instance the Territory of Colorado came and of its motion sought an enabling act for the formation of a constitution and admission as a State into the Union. This bill was fully considered by the Committee on Appropriations. A subcommittee was appointed, of which I believe the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Hale] was chairman. That gentleman reported the bill to the House with the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on Appropriations. I ask the gentleman from Maine to state to the House whether I am not correct in saying that letter of the First Comptroller declared that in no instance had the Congress of the United States borne any such expense as is now asked to be paid.

What has that letter to do with it?

Mr. FORT. Mr. HALE. Mr. HALE. In answer to the inquiry made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] I can say with distinctness that the letter of the First Comptroller, to whom was referred the question whether there existed any precedent for payment of a claim of this kind, responded in direct specific terms that there was no such precedent. When I reported the bill which was originally referred to the Committee on Appropriations back to the House with the recommendation that it lie upon the table, thinking objections might be raised I sent the letter with the bill to the Clerk's desk, and so do not have it with me know. However, I have sent to the proper place in the Clerk's office for it. But that is its purport, that no precedent was found by the First Comptroller of the Treasury for the payment of any such expenses.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let meask the gentleman from Maine whether he did not also find in his investigation that there were never before any similar circumstances to those of the case of Colorado requiring any such precedent?

Mr. HALE. I do not remember any distinctive difference between this and some other cases.

Mr. PATTERSON. But the committee knew the expenses of the constitutional convention of Nebraska were paid by an appropriation ? Mr. HALE. No; Nebraska waspaid, if I remember correctly, by the original act providing that any balance of appropriation should go in this way; and it was found there was surplus enough to pay the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The amount was $7,000. It was the unexpended balance of appropriation for the Territory which was used to pay the expense in the case of Nebraska.

Mr. HALE. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I stated that the First Comptroller in his letter declared he sylvania, I stated that the First Comptroller in his letter declared he can find no precedent for any such payment.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite content to leave this matter to the judgment of the House. I have stated the facts precisely as they are; and my duty therefore is fully discharged.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. What I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, is that nearly all of the constitutions of the new States were framed by popular bodies without congressional enabling acts. It was the seed in mr. State where the constitution was framed by reporter. by popular bodies without congressional enabling acts. It was the case in my State where the constitution was framed by a popular movement, and, as we know, Kansas was kept out for some seven or eight years. In the case of Colorado, the Government has been paying the expenses of the territorial government, amounting to about $100,000 a year, while the enabling act which was passed provided for taking effect at a period in the future, thereby preventing the people frame in the contract of t ple from raising money by any other means to pay the expenses of their constitutional convention. This convention was created by act of Congress, and, as gentlemen will see by the very terms of the act itself, we prevent the people from raising money to pay expenses in any other way than is sought for in the pending proposition. It is the only precedent of the kind on record in the history of the country, and by voting for this we save $100,000 a year by putting the State government into operation.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I wish to say a word in further explanation. The letter of the First Comptroller, to which the gentleman from Maine has referred, I have seen, and it is to this effect: An inquiry was made of him by some member of the committee—

Mr. RANDALL. The letter is now here, and I hope it will be read.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I will yield for the reading of the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, + Washington, D. C., January 15, 1876.

Sir: In reply to your reference to this Office of the "House bill No. 355, making an appropriation of $20,000 for the expenses of the constitutional convention of Colorado" and requesting information as to the precedents, I would state that I have made a careful examination of the acts of Congress relating to like conventions, going back to 1836.

I find that in no case was any appropriation made to defray the costs incident thereto.

In the enabling act for Nebraska (Statutes at Large, volume 13, page 50) the fourteenth section provided "that any unexpended balance of the appropriation for said territorial legislative expenses of Nebraska remaining for the fiscal years 1863 and 1864, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to, and used for, defraying the expenses of said convention." A like provision is contained in the Colorado enabling act under which this convention is held, approved March 3, 1873. 3, 1875. Very respectfully,

R. W. TAYLER, Comptroller.

Hon. Eugene Hale, House of Representatives.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, the First Comptroller of the Treasury, in response to the inquiry, states there is no precedent for an appropriation to pay the expenses of a constitutional convention of a Territory. The committee will bear in mind, however, the facts are different from the case now presented. It will also bear in mind that Congress did appropriate for the expenses of the constitutional convention of Nebraska, and did pay those expenses, the items of which I have here in a letter and statement from the same First Comptroller of the Treasury. To be sure it was done out of an unexpended balance of appropriation. My first impression was against this appropriation, but, after I had looked into the matter and examined all the circumstances, I finally came to the conclusion there was no other course which was just, equitable, and right to the people of Colorado than to provide for making this payment. It is this: Here was an appropriation bill of the last session of Congress for the legislative expenses of the Territory of Colorado, and here was a clause in this enabling act providing that that unexpended balance should be used for the payment of the expenses of this convention called to form a constitution. But, in the amendments made between this House and the Senate, Congress provided that the convention should be postponed until the time when the Legislature should be compelled to meet; and by this mistake it came about that there was no balance. The evident intention of Congress was that the expenses of this constitutional convention should be paid when it convened and paid out of that balance which was on hand out of the appropriation which then existed. Congress having rendered that impossible, will Congress now say that these individuals shall return to their homes, having paid their own expenses? I do not believe that it is the judgment of this committee or of this House to so do. I ask a vote on the bill.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?
Mr. SOUTHARD. I yield to the gentleman.
Mr. FRYE. When this matter was under discussion in the last Congress I took very great interest in the admission of Colorado. I saw that she was about the only Territory which was, as has been well remarked, a creditor of the United States. Almost if not every other one has been a debtor.
Mr. MAGINNIS. Which one?

As I understand, this is about the only Territory which Mr. FRYE. has been a creditor of the United States under the internal-revenue

Mr. MAGINNIS. On the contrary, with one or two exceptions, they are all creditors of the United States.

are all creditors of the United States.

Mr. FRYE. Well, sir, taking a great interest in the admission of Colorado I examined carefully the bill under which she was to be admitted. If I remember aright that bill contained a provision for the payment of the expenses of this very convention, precisely as the bill admitting Nebraska contained such a provision. And, if I understand aright the gentleman from Ohio, if that bill had been enacted at the time it first passed this House, if the time for holding the convention had not been postponed, the expenses of that convention would have been paid precisely as the expenses of the Nebraska convention. would have been paid precisely as the expenses of the Nebraska convention were paid.

Now, by our own act here, by postponing this convention, we deprived this Territory of Colorado of that privilege, which we as Congressmen fully intende, to confer upon her in the bill which we passed. And it seems to me just, honest, fair, and equitable, and nothing more, that Congress to-day should appropriate what Congress intended fully to have appropriated originally when this legislation took place.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The argument that is made in favor of the payment by the United States of this amount for the expenses of the constitutional convention of Colorado, based upon the amount of taxes that are paid and collected in the Territory, does not seem to me sound. We are liable for and actually pay alarge amount through the general appropriations for the benefit of the Territories, just the same as we do for the benefit of the States. Take one of the Western States where a large amount is collected through the internal revenue, the State of Indiana or the State of Illinois, and can those revenue, the State of Indiana or the State of Illinois, and can those States claim that, because they pay say fifteen or twenty million dollars, and there is but a small amount directly appropriated for the State, therefore there is a credit due to the State, and that a direct appropriation should be made to the State?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I will show the gentleman the distinction. The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Those Western States and all the States that pay Mr. MAGINNIS. Those Western States and all the States that pay internal revenue are represented on this floor. They have a right to vote what shall be done with the money that is raised by taxation from their people. The Constitution says that the direct taxes and representation shall be apportioned equally for that reason; but the Territories of the United States pay these taxes, and have no power to say where a single dollar of that money shall go.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. That goes to the legality or constitutionality of imposing any tax upon the Territories.

Mr. MAGINNIS. We are speaking of it from a moral point of view.

Mr. BURCHARD of Illinois. It does not go to the question of the

Mr. MAGINNIS. We are speaking of it from a moral point of view. Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. It does not go to the question of the equity of the payment of this money. I for one would not object to the payment of these expenses so far as this particular Territory is concerned if it were the only case. But this may be a precedent, and if this is agreed to it will be the first case, as has been stated, where a direct appropriation has ever been made from the Treasury for the payment of the expenses of holding a constitutional convention. One or two exceptional cases have been mentioned where an appropriation has been made for the expenses of a territorial government, with a prohas been made for the expenses of a territorial government, with a provision in the law, as there was in this law, that any surplus should be applied to defray the expenses of a constitutional convention, and in one or two cases, as I understand, such appropriation has been made; but in no case after or before a convention has been held has there been a direct and special appropriation from the Treasury for the payment of those expenses.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. Can it afford a precedent, unless the same circumstances hereafter are found existing as to a Territory?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Of course not. It cannot afford a precedent for a case which is entirely different.

Mr. FRYE. But does the gentleman believe that there will ever be a case which shall present the same phasis that this case presents? Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I presume there is no case exactly like this, and I do not know that there was ever a territorial convention held to frame a State constitution which presents exactly the same case as any other case. We have had conventions held where there have been provisional governors, conventions held within the Southern States where the conventions formed State constitutions, and those constitutions came before Congress for consideration and for the admission of Representatives from the same to membership upon this floor. In those cases I do not know that there was ever any pay-ment of expenses by the General Govenment, or in the case of ter-ritorial conventions being held.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] asks me if this is not an exceptional case. I understand that in this case the bill as it passed the House provided for holding the convention at an early day. That view, however, was not concurred in by the Senate and did not become a part of the law, but as the law was finally adopted by Congress, concurred in by the House, and signed by the President, it was fixed that this convention should be held in July of this year. That is my understanding.

Mr. FRYE. Was not the bill passed at so late a day in the session Mr. FRYE. Was not the bill pa that that matter was overlooked?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. It is a part of the law concurred in by the House, and therefore this House cannot say that it was expected that the convention should be held at an earlier date, for we adopted the law as it finally passed.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of passing the bill reported by the committee, and on the distinct ground that, in my judgment, the Government of the United States is committed in favor of that proposition in such a manner that they cannot in equity and good conscience recede from it.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am not alarmed by the inquiry propounded, whether or not, if we adopt this bill, we shall not quiry propounded, whether or not, if we adopt this bill, we shall not be setting a precedent that will bind us and those who succeed us to pass similar bills providing for the payment of the expenses of conventions that shall be called in other Territories when they come to apply for admission into the Union. The number of Territories in existence, or which shall hereafter be created, is not sufficiently large, nor will the amount of money involved, if the United States shall pay it he reflicient to alarm, even the most extreme of those who are in it, be sufficient to alarm even the most extreme of those who are in favor of retrenchment, economy, and reform.

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of so legislating at this time and in this bill as that we shall cast no imputation on the honor and good faith of the Government of the United States. I see, Mr. Chairman, in the thirteenth section of the enabling act, providing for the calling of this convention for the purpose of framing a constitution preparatory to the admission of Colorado into the Union, that it was expressly contemplated that the expenses of this convention, which is now in session, should be paid out of funds belonging to the Government of the United States.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the expenditures of the fund specially designated by Congress out of which this payment was to be made had been anticipated in consequence of the session of the Legislature, but the honor and good faith of the Government were pledged by that section of the act. To meet the expenses of this constitutional convention, and because that fund has been expended contrary to the expectation of that Congress, is no reason why provision should not now be made. To say, Mr. Chairman, that, when this thirteenth section was enacted by the Congress of the United States, they contemplated that the fund would be spent and thus the Government would not have to pay, is simply to charge that that Congress was guilty of pitiful and contemptible paltering in the enactment of the statute. I say, sir, that they did, when they authorized the calling of this convention, hold out a pledge of the public faith that the expenses of this convention should be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. And I say that we cannot redeem that pledge, in my judgment, except by making the appropriation now asked for.

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of the most rigid economy in every direction, but for one, however anxious I may be for retrenchment and for reform, I am not, and never shall be, found voting in favor of those measures of retrenchment and reform that will put the Congress of the United States in a posture before the world of paltering with its pledges and violating the implied faith declared by its legislative enactments.

For one I am prepared to vote for this bill, and I believe that it

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, as has already been stated, this matter came before the Committee on Appropriations. It was not hastily but carefully considered. In the first place, a sub-committee was appointed to go to the Treasury Department and there examine the records and see what had been the precedents upon this subject, and what has been the course of the Government toward the Territories and questions of this character.

The letter of the Comptroller has already been read, in which he states to the Hon. Mr Hale, that, after a careful examination of all acts admitting Territories into the Union, going back as far as 1836, the uniform course has been for the Territories to pay the cost of these constitutional conventions themselves. This has been the general rule.

But we are told that in the case of Nebraska there was an excep tion, which is true. The Committee of the Whole, however, will observe that the general rule has been to the contrary. What was the exception? The convention of Nebraska was permitted to expend the unexpended balance of the appropriation designed for the expenses of the territorial Legislature in paying the expenses of the convention. That convention sat for a single day, and only about $7.000 expenditures were incurred by it. That is the only exception to this rule. Because of that exception gentlemen come here and ask this House to take it as a precedent and to overturn the prior ask this House to take it as a precedent and to overtain the pro-action of Congress on that subject.

The Delegate from Colorado [Mr. Patterson] has told us of the difficulties surrounding this convention. He has told us that there is no provision for paying its expenses. Sir, this is not the first time when trouble has existed in a State or Territory in connection with its finances. I have no doubt but that they can make arrangements, nor do I have any doubt but what they have made arrangements and ample arrangements to pay the expenses of this convention. I do not know that I would state what was amiss if I were to say that it had been already arranged, and the committee have been so informed. If that be true, then that appeal ought not to have been presented to

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman state his authority for that?
Mr. BLOUNT. I prefer not doing it, except with the consent of the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire to say this; I take the daily paper published at Denver, and I have watched the proceedings of the convention and of the Legislature. If there has been any provision made for this purpose I am totally unaware of it. On the contrary, all the in o-mation I received from members of the convention is that they must look to Congress for their pay if they receive any at all.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not say that the convention as a body have provided for these expenses; but I do say that arrangements have been made for the expenses of the convention.

Mr. BATTERSON I are tall you what arrangements Happy have

Mr. PATTERSON. I can tell you what arrangements I know have been made. When the members of that convention first went to the city of Denver the four national banks of Denver loaned to the individual members of the convention upon their individual credit the sum of $75 each-

Mr. FORT. That is it.

Mr. PORT. Has been which they were compelled to give their individual notes, which notes they must pay when they mature.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has the convention attempted to negotiate a loan?

Mr. PATTERSON. The convention has no earthly power to negotiate a loan.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that; but if they have not the power, if that is the only difficulty, we can authorize them to do it. But it seems nothing will do but that this money shall come out of the Treasury. Cannot we devise some other scheme? If the convention will ask for authority to do it, I will be ready and this House will be ready to grant it. But nothing but the money will answer the purpose. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations and as a member of this side of the House, planting myself in favor of economy and as a barrier to every effort to break down the precedents upon this subject, I shall resist this appropriation to the last. The Committee on Appropriations have examined this matter carefully. Their purpose has been to do whatis right, and I feel that they have acted in perfect accordance with all the precedents upon this subject.

Mr. HOSKINS. I do not intend to occupy the time of this commit-Mr. HOSKINS. I do not intend to occupy the time of this committee except for a few moments. Having been honored in the last Congress with a position on the Committee on Territories and being entirely familiar with the legislation in regard to the admission of Colorado as a State, I desire to say that when the enabling act for the Territory of Colorado was under consideration in the Committee on Territories this question of paying the members of the convention was considered by that committee. Provision was supposed to have been made in the bill reported from the committee and which passed this House sufficient to pay the expenses of the convention. It was supposed that those expenses would be defrayed out of the appropriation which it was understood would be reported by the Committee on Appropriations for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the Legislature of the Territory.

When that bill passed this House and went to the Senate it lay over for a long time, during which the Committee on Appropriations in this House reported a bill making provision for the legislative ex-penses of the Territory, appropriating $22,000 for the purpose. Had the bill passed the Senate as it passed the House, that $22,000 would have been sufficient to defray all the expenses of this convention. But while the enabling act was pending in the Senate, the bill making the appropriation passed the House and the Senate. Afterward the enabling act came back from the Senate amended so as to defer the time of admission for two years. It came back to the House in the very last hours of the session, and any contest upon the amendment of the Senate would have been likely to result in the loss of the bill. It was therefore deemed wise and expedient to pass the bill precisely as it came from the Senate, which was done. Now, when two years have elapsed, by reason of the action of the other branch of Congress, so that the fund appropriated upon the report of the Committee on Appropriations is not available for this purpose, I say it is not just to compel this territorial convention to meet without compensa-While the Committee on Appropriations will always find me ready to stand by them in all proper measures of economy and retrenchment, I say to them and to the House that while we economize we should be just.

Mr. BEEBE. Mr. Chairman, I have but a word to say on this measure. It has been a matter of pleasure with me that I have hitherto been able to concur with and support the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in all his endeavors to retrench and economize the public expenditures, and I feel that he has done no more than his duty upon this occasion as a watchman of the interests of the Republic; yet I cannot bring myself to consent to support the proposition which he has made.

Sir, I find that this differs in many respects from many measures hitherto taken for the admission of Territories as States into the Union. In the first place, there has been no concurrence of sentiment on the part of the people of Colorado leading to this action on the part of the Government of the United States; but Congress at its last session provided that there should be a convention held in that Territory. Under what auspices? Congress authoritatively provided that the governor, the chief-justice, and the United States district attorney—not one of them a servant of the people of Colorado—should issue a proclamation; that they should even make the apportionment; and they were charged also with the duty of providing for holding the election which was to confirm or reject the constitution to be framed. Now, when the Government of the United States, acting through the instrumentality of its own agents, imposes an obliing through the instrumentality of its own agents, imposes an obligation upon a Territory or any other community, it is the duty of the Government to provide for the payment of the expenses necessarily incurred. Suppose this convention had framed a constitution not acceptable to the people of that Territory, what authority would there have been in the Legislature of Colorado to provide for the payment of the expenses of the members of that convention? There certainly would have been zone. The Covernment in my coining because in the convention of the convention of the convention of the convention. of the expenses of the members of that convention I There certainly would have been none. The Government, in my opinion, has in the thirteenth section of this act precluded itself from making any objection. It made provision that a certain fund, stipulated and specified, the payment of these expenses. The only should be appropriated to the payment of these expenses. The only trouble seems to arise from the fact that the fund is insufficient. Now, who is to make good the balance? It seems to me that if a balance is necessary to be provided, the same authority which provided for the expenditure in the first instance must provide for the deficiency.

I am asked to read the thirteenth section of the law. It is as fol-

Any balance of the appropriation for the legislative expenses of said Territory of Colorado remaining unexpended shall be applied to and used for defraying the expenses of said convention and for the payment of the members thereof, under the same rules, regulations, and rights as are now provided by law for the payment of the territorial Legislature.

Now, what have we a right to infer from that thirteenth section? I submit to the sense of fairness of any gentleman of this committee that inasmuch as the Government of the United States fixed the right penditures incurred by that convention which it in its judgment should regard as necessarily and properly incurred f

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman that the whole of that law was enacted upon the petition of the people of Colorado. There was a petition to this House to enable them to form a constitution and come into the Union as a State.

Mr. BEEBE. How did that petition come here?
Mr. RANDALL. It came here in every form of expression—by letter, by petition to the House, by the introduction of bills, by reports of committees.

Mr. BEEBE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is possessed of an intellect altogether too discriminating to fail to see that if the Government of the United States took the steps which I have stated, it makes no difference what moved the Government to take that action.

Mr. RANDALL. We agreed to give them the benefit of all the money that remained in the territorial treasury. Now in this measure it is proposed to go beyond that and do what we have never done before, appropriate $20,000 additional. My simple duty is done when I acquaint the House with this fact.

Mr. BEEBE. I understand the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania very well. But if the people of Colorado, either in their individual capacity as citizens or through their Legislature, had come here and asked for a convention could not Congress have re-come here and asked for a convention, could not Congress have referred the matter back to the people, giving them in fact an enabling act instead of imposing upon them a bill with provisions such as we find in this?

Mr. RANDALL. The bill was entirely satisfactory at the time to the people of Colorado.

Mr. BEEBE. I concede that it was satisfactory. The Government of the United States stepped forward and pledged itself in a certain direction to certain matters; the people of Colorado accepted that action of the Government. They have met their obligations, and now I cannot sustain the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his position that the Federal Government shall not also stand by its pledge.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I call for a vote on the amendments recommended by the committee.

The amendments were read and agreed to.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it be passed with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1328) to amend the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875, had directed him to report the same with amendments and to recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.
The question being on the passage of the bill,
Mr. SPARKS called for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1190) to amend certain sections of titles 48 and 52, regulation of commerce and navigation, and regulation of steam-vessels, Revised Statutes of the United States, pages 800 and 857, with amendments and a report in writing; and the same were ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. REAGAN. I give notice to the House, as many members feel a deep interest in this question, that it is the intention of the Committee on Commerce to call up the bill for action at a very early day.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER. The special order fixed by the House for this day at this hour is a bill (H. R. No. 1798) to re-organize the judiciary of the United States, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCrary.]

Mr. KNOTT. I ask that the bill be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Cierk read the bill, as ionows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That a circuit court shall be eld in every judicial district of the United States at the same time and place at which a district court shall or may be held; and such circuit court is hereby created and established in every district where no such court now exists, and shall belong to the circuit in whose territorial limits it is embraced; and when more than one judge competent to hold such circuit court is present, each judge may hold a separate session thereof, in which case the presiding justice or judge shall, from time to time, designate the causes to be tried or heard before the other judge or judges. And when no separate terms or sessions are prescribed by law for the circuit and district courts of the same district, the panel of jurors selected and summoned for the district court shall also be the panel of the circuit court, unless a special order to the contrary be made by one of the judges of s..ld circuit court at least thirty days before the term.

SEC. 16. After the said 1st day of September, all appeals and writs of error taken or gued out, from the final judgment or decree of any court of the United States within a Territory, shall be taken as provided by this act, and shall lie to such court of appeals as may be designated by general order of the supreme court of the Territory

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, as it is probable that no subject of greater importance to the people of this country, irrespective of sections or parties, will be presented for the consideration of the present Congress, I trust I shall have the careful attention of gentlemen for a very few minutes, while I shall endeavor to state some of the reasons which, in my judgment, render the passage of the bill just read, or some similar measure, an imperative necessity. There is perhaps not a solitary gentleman, certainly no member of the legal profession, on this floor who is not aware that for years there have been constantly reiterated complaints growing out of the condition of business and the manner in which it is transacted in many of our Federal courts, and especially in the Supreme Court of the United States. I would not be understood as intending by the use of this language to insinuate even the remotest reflection upon either the ability or the integrity of any of the distinguished jurists who now adorn the highest judicial tribunal under this Government. Very far from it indeed. On the contrary, I congratulate myself that I have this opportunity to testify my high appreciation of their talents, their learning, and their honesty and to say furthermore, that if questions of law are not always dealt with by them with that precision which can result alone from mature deliberation, if their opinions are not always expressed with that strict accuracy which should characterize the judgments of the highest court of appeal in the land, if it frequently appears that there is a marked difference of opinion among them on questions submitted to their adjudication, it results, I have no doubt, from the very evil which it is the leading object of this bill to remedy. It results from the enormous amount of labor which under our existing judicial system they are expected to accomplish within a limited period of time an amount of labor to which human nature, even when gifted with most transcendent faculties, is utterly inadequate.

On the 11th of last October there were six hundred and sixty-three causes upon the docket of the Supreme Court of the United States. Since that time there have been added to it two hundred and twentysix new cases, making in all nine hundred and twenty-nine; and I am informed by the officers of that court, and others who are familiar with the transaction of its business, that the number of cases annually disposed of, including those which are summarily dismissed or stricken from the docket, is about three hundred. So that it is apparent, as things now exist, three years must clapse from the time a cause is docketed until it reaches a final hearing in that court.

But that is not all. Whoever properly estimates the marvelous increase in our population and in our commerce, the vast multiplication of corporations, and the infinite variety of questions growing out of such institutions legitimately coming before that court, cannot fail to appreciate the fact that the business of the court must continue to increase in a like proportion. The fact is that there were one hundred and eleven more causes added to the docket of the Supreme Court of the United States during the last four months than there were causes disposed of within the same period, including those summarily dismissed. And if the business of that court shall continue to increase with the same ratio, it will not be long until it will reach a point when fully five years must clapse from the time of filing the record until a final adjudication is reached; to say nothing of the delay, frequently considerable, which must take place from the taking of the appeal to the deposit of the record in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court! Five years' delay of justice! Five lingering, weary years of anxious waiting! And that, too, frequently attended with absolute ruin to the unfortunate suitor!

Why, Mr. Speaker, if the melancholy Prince of Denmark, when he paused upon the brink of suicide, had been the victim of such a tardy paused upon the brink of suicide, had been the victim of such a tardy system as this, he would not have hesitated a solitary moment to take the fatal plunge. He might have borne "the whips and scorns of time," "the proud man's contumely;" he might have nerved himself up even to bear "the insolence of office;" he might have got along under "the pangs of despised love;" but when he came to contemplate the "law's delay" he would not have hesitated a single moment.

The undiscovered country, from whose bourn No traveler returns, would have had no terrors for him. O, no! He would have said, Let me emigrate to that country, or any other country, rather than this.

Now, sir, this is simply intolerable, and some remedy must be devised. There have been a variety of remedies for this evil suggested. One is to divide the Supreme Court into divisions of three and give each division exclusive jurisdiction over a particular class of cases. As I suppose, however, that such a suggestion would meet with but little if any favor here, I forbear discussing it. Another suggestion has been to increase the number of judges. But the experience of legal gentlemen will justify me in the assertion that the increased facility with which business is transacted in appellate courts is not at all commensurate with the increase in the number of judges, to say nothing of the increased expenditure that such a plan would necessarily involve.

Another suggestion has been to increase the amount necessary to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction in cases of appeal or writ of error. The answer to that is simply this: that the limit now fixed is perhaps exorbitant Five thousand dollars is now the minimum. And cases involving $5,000 not unfrequently cover a man's entire fortune. Such cases in our Federal courts are very frequently heard and determined by a single judge and that hastily, too, and under circumstances which preclude such careful deliberation as the magnitude of the interest demands. An erroneous judgment involving $5,000 may, as I have already intimated, be the ruin of the unfortunate suitor, who has no chance at all under existing laws to have the judgment revised.

Now, this bill which the committee have reported to the House proposes a remedy for the evils to which I have alluded, by the esproposes a remedy for the evils to which I have aliuded, by the establishment of a court of appeal in each United States circuit, to consist of the justice of the Supreme Court, the circuit judge and the district judges whose districts are embraced within the circuit, any three of whom may constitute a quorum. To this court of appeal civil cases amounting to over $500 may be moved for review upon appeal or writ of error, while it is designed also to have appellate jurisdiction in all criminal cases tried in the Federal courts. From the decision of this appellate court the bill allows an appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court in all cases involving over $10,000 or where the court shall certify that the question is of sufficient importance to require adjudication by the court of ultimate resort, the Supreme Court of the United States.

Some of the merits of this measure may be briefly stated as follows: It enlarges the right of appeal to the citizen, while it furnishes him a convenient tribunal of commanding dignity and authority for its determination near his own domicile, instead of requiring him, as is the case now, to travel from twelve hundred to three thousand miles to have the trial of his cause delayed for from three to five years. Another merit is that it does not increase the number of judges nor the expenses of our present judiciary system a solitary dollar. It is true there is a provision for paying a per diem to district judges when required to attend the court of appeal at a place different from their own residences. But, if gentlemen will examine the details of the bill, they will find that by an alteration made with re-gard to the grand and petit juries the amount thus expended will be more than compensated.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.
Mr. KNOTT. I will hear the question.
Mr. BLAND. Does this bill give the right of appeal in all cases where the Constitution of the United States confers jurisdiction on the Supreme Court, without regard to the amount?

Mr. KNOTT. Yes, sir. I will now send to the Clerk a number of amendments which have been agreed upon by the Committee on the Judiciary, some of which were left out in the engrossment of the substitute as reported by the committee and some of which have since been determined upon.

The amendments proposed by the committee to the bill were read, as follows:

Add to section 2 the following: "Provided that no district judge shall sit on the trial of any case of appeal or error from his own decision."

In line 3, section 4, strike out the word "it," and insert in lieu thereof "its presiding judge."

Add to section 6 the following: "All provisions of law now in force defining the cases in which appeals may be taken or writs of error be sued out, for the review by the Supreme Court of the final judgment or decree of a circuit or district court or regulating, proceedings in such cases shall, except as modified by this act, apply to appeals taken and writs of error sued out under this section."

Strike out section 8, and insert the following:

Sec. 8. That all appeals and writs of error allowed or sued out after the 1st day of September, 1876, shall be taken, allowed, or sued out under and according to the provisions of this act; but all cases which shall be pending in any circuit court on said day upon appeal or writs of error shall be heard and determined by such circuit court in the same manner as if this act had not been passed.

In line 5, section 10, after the word "proceedings" insert "except in capital

In line 4, section 11, strike out "Albany" and insert "New York."
In line 3, section 16, strike out "any court of the United States within a" and insert "the supreme court of any."

Mr. BRADFORD. I ask leave to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky if he was instructed to offer the amendments which have been reported by the Clerk as amendments to the original

Yes, sir. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bradford] in a few moments. There are some amendments which gentlemen desire to offer in regard to the localities of the court of appeals. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr.

LAWRENCE.] Mr. LAWRENCE. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky whether it would not be better to have the amendments reported by the committee first agreed to, and after that I will, according to the agreement as I understand it, make a motion in relation to one section of the bill. I suggest, however, that it would be better first to dispose of the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. KNOTT. Then I ask the Chair to put the question if there is any objection to the adoption of the amendments reported by the committee

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendments reported by the committee?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I object. I object to one of the amendments reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, the one proposed to section 10, and at the proper time I desire to have a separate vote taken on that amendment. It is as follows:

But such writ of error shall not operate as a stay of proceedings except in capi-

I gave notice that I desired to oppose this amendment.

Mr. KNOTT. I beg pardon of my colleague on the committee, [Mr. CAULFIELD.] I recollect now that we did reserve the privilege of excepting to that amendment. I will ask that the House now agree to all the amendments reported from the Committee on the Judiciary except the one to the tenth section.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. KNOTT. Now, in order that we may have before the House all Mr. KNOTT. Now, in order that we may have before the House all the amendments in regard to the locality of these courts, I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] who, I understand, desires to offer an amendment in that regard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLACKBURN.) The amendment excepted to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] is still pending before the House and undisposed of.

Mr. KNOTT. I had supposed that these amendments to the different process.

Mr. KNOTT. I had supposed that these amendments to the dif-ferent sections of the bill could all be offered and be pending before calling the previous question upon the bill and amendments. yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to offer an amendment.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has an amendment which I wish to have offered before I offer mine. It is possible the adoption of that amendment may preclude the necessity of action upon my amendment, and therefore I would like to have action first upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KNOTT. Very well. I will, then, yield to the gentleman from

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend section 11 of this bill in that clause relating to the place of holding the court of appeals in the sixth circuit, by striking out "Louisville" and inserting "Cincinnati." I will state very briefly some of the reasons for this amendment and I hope I may have the attention of the House for a very few moments while I present them.

The bill as reported provides that the court of appeals for the sixth circuit shall be held at Louisville. The object of the amendment I have proposed is to require this court to be held at Cincinnati.

It is very natural that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. KNOTT,] who reported this bill and who so ably represents the State of Kentucky, should desire to have the court of appeals held in that chief city of the State from which he comes, the city of Lou-But these courts should be held wherever they will best promote the interests and secure the convenience of the bar and the people concerned in the business to be therein transacted. There are three modes by which we may determine the proper point for the location of a court: It may be determined with a view to the center of population, or to the center of territory over which the court has jurisdiction, or with a view to the center of the business to be transacted in the court.

It so happens that Cincinnati is more nearly the geographical center of the sixth circuit, and it is more nearly the center of population, and more nearly the center of business than is the city of Louisville. I have same figures to submit in support of these allegations which I

It will be understood, of course, that the city of Cincinnati is upon the extreme southern border of the State of Ohio, and very nearly in the southwest corner of the State. The sixth circuit, in which a place is to be fixed for holding the court of appeals, embraces the States of Michigan, Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Now let us inquire first of all where is the center of population of these States? According to the last census Ohio had a population of 2,665,260 and Michigan of 1,187,234, or for the two States, 3,852,494; the States of Kentucky and Tennessee had a total population of 2,579,531, of which Kentucky had

1,321,011, and Tennessee 1,258,520.

Now, while the States of Ohio and Michigan, north of and contiguous to Cincinnati, have a population of nearly four millions, the territory in this sixth circuit south of and contiguous to Cincinnati has ritory in this sixth circuit south of and contiguous to Cincinnati has a population of only a little over two million five hundred thousand. Where then should this court be located, with a view of accommodating this population? Evidently on the southern border of Ohio, where a vast majority of the people interested will be more accessible to it than if it should be located at Louisville. The location of the court at Cincinnati will be quite as convenient to the population south of Cincinnati as it would be at Louisville, if not more so. Besides that, the new Cincinnati and Southern Railroad, which is now in process of construction from Cincinnati south, and whose objective point is Knoxville, Tennessee, will in a short time furnish a much bet-ter means of communication with Cincinnati than can possibly be had ter means of communication with Cincinnati than can possibly be had with Louisville by any route extending through Kentucky and Tennessee, or in any direction whatever. In any point of view, therefore, so far as the accommodation of the population is concerned, Cincinnati has largely the advantage over the city of Louisville.

But that is not all. Cincinnati is more nearly the geographical center than is Louisville. Let us look at the figures. Ohio has 39,964 square miles of territory and Michigan 56,451 square miles, or a total for the two States of 96,415, all north of Cincinnati, with every facility for reaching that city, and none for reaching Louisville except by passing through the former city. South of Cincinnati Kentucky has passing through the former city. South of Cincinnati, Kentucky has 37,680 square miles of territory and Tennessee 45,600 miles, or a total for the two States of 83,280 miles, as against 96,415 square miles of territory north of Cincinnati. The people of nearly all this territory can reach Cincinnati quite as readily as Louisville, and most of them much more so. Geographically considered, then, Cincinnati is the right place for this court. Now these are figures which cannot lie.

But when we come to consider the business of the court, Cincinnati has largely the advantage over Louisville.

Sir, if you will take the returns of the census of 1870, you will find that the city and commercial population of Ohio and Michigan, embracing as these States do such cities as Cincinnati, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Zanesville, and others where there are large commercial transactions out of which litigation constantly arises, exceeds greatly the city and commercial population of Kentucky and Tennessee. Of course I do not attempt to enumerate all the commercial cities of Michigan and Ohio. I might mention Dayton, Springfield, Bellefontaine, and other important places; but the character of these and many others I might name as commercial cities is so well understood that it is not necessary I should enumerate them. The commerce of the great lakes is immense, vastly greater than that which floats on the Ohio River. The litigation arising from lake commerce is by far larger than all similar litigation which can arise south of Cincin

Besides, sir, a large part of the litigation in this court of appeals will come from the great corporations in this sixth circuit; and these will be found to be located to a much larger extent at Cleveland, Detroit, Toledo, Cincinnati, and other prominent cities in the northern half of the circuit than in any or all parts of Kentucky and Tennessee. A considerable part of the litigation in the courts of the sixth circuit consists of revenue cases. Some idea of the comparative amount of these revenue cases north of Cincinnati as compared with amount of these revenue cases north of Cuclinatias compared with those south of it may be formed by looking at the returns of revenue derived from the tax on spirits under the internal-revenue law. During the last fiscal year Ohio paid a tax on spirits amounting to $9,958,711; Michigan, $268,985; making a total of $10,227,696. During the same period Kentucky paid $7,005,612, and Tennessee, $671,885; making a total of $7,677,497. And there was no "crooked whisky" in Ohio of any considerable consequence.

Mr. FRYE. None discovered the gentleman means.

Mr. FRYE. None discovered, the gentleman means.
Mr. LAWRENCE. At least none discovered. [Laughter.] And a large quantity of all this was produced in and near Cincinnati. Besides all this, Cincinnati, Clevland, and Toledo do more commercial business than all the cities of Kentucky and Tennessee put together.

Mr. SAYLER. And then there is Detroit.
Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir; the city of Detroit has more business than Louisville. I say this not for the purpose of disparaging the fertile States of Kentucky and Tennessee with their growing commerce and population, but to present merely the facts as they are, in the hope that this House will so locate this court of appeals as that it will be in the geographical center—in the center of population, in the center of commerce, in the center of litigation, in the center of busi-

As I have remarked, my excellent friend the learned chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. KNOTT,] who reported this bill, would very naturally be in favor of Louisville; and with his commanding influence in the committee I could not hope to secure a change in the bill in this respect. But when I come into the House and present these facts which no man can controvert, I submit that the House ought to fix this court at the city of Cincinnati.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I merely desire to say—
Mr. REAGAN. I want at some proper time, before it becomes too late, to offer two or three amendments of an important character.

Mr. KNOTT. We will hear the amendments read for information

Mr. REAGAN. I will send them up to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to have the amendments read now the Mr. KNOTT. No, sir, not now.

Mr. KNOIT. No, sir, not now.

I desire to say that my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] does me "honor overmuch" when he insinuates that it was owing to any undue influence of mine in the committee that Louisville was selected as the point at which this court of appeals should be held. Sir, when that question was under consideration in the committee, I observed my accustomed modesty; I never said one solitary word in favor of Louisville or against Cincinnati; I left it to my colleagues on the committee to determine for themselves with the lights before them as to where this court should themselves, with the lights before them, as to where this court should be held. And with the exception, I believe, of my learned colleague, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] the committee very properly concluded that Louisville should be the point.

Mr. SAYLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question, as I cannot get the floor for a speech?

Mr. KNOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYLER. Does not the gentleman know that that was a sort of concession to him in a friendly way as chairman of the committee, and does he not know also that to locate this court of appeals at Louisville is to take it about two hundred miles away from the chief part of the business, I will say nine-tenths of the business, of the sixth circuit?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I do not understand that the chairman of the committee insists on Louisville now. I think he is inclined to surrender the point.

Mr KNOTT. The gentleman has asked me a question and I will answer him very frankly. I do not know, nor do I suspect, that Louisville was selected as the point at which this court of appeals should be held out of any deference to me whatever. The decision was made in recognition and proper appreciation of the superior claims of Louis-ville to the court. Now, as to the difference in travel, I believe it is only about four hours, provided all the business should have to come through Cincinnati.

Mr. SAYLER. But that travel is over a very bad Kentucky railroad.

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman forgets that all the railroads coming to Louisville do not come through Cincinnati, by any means.

Mr. SAYLER. They do to a pretty large extent.

Mr. KNOTT. And besides, it is just about as convenient to get to Louisville by railroad from a large portion of even the northern part of Ohio and Michigan as it is to get to Cincinnati, while Louisville is largely more convenient for Tennessee and Kentucky. I suppose it was in view of these facts that my colleagues on the committee fixed upon Louisville without any consultation with me and without my having said a solitary word about it. I, however, want the House to pass this bill in the best shape possible. Now, sir, I have promised to yield for other amendments.

Mr. SAYLER. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. KNOTT. I cannot do it. Mr. SAYLER. I want to know whether the entire maritime jurisdiction of the court-

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman must excuse me; I do not yield. Mr. SAYLER. My city is very much interested in this matter, and

Mr. SAYLER. My city is very much interested in this matter, and I think I should have some consideration.

Mr. KNOTT. Certainly you will have the kindest consideration whenever it is within my power to extend it to you, but I have already promised a portion of my time to other gentlemen.

I desire to say now to gentlemen who have amendments that they wish to offer in regard to the localities for this court of appeals, that they can offer their amendments, but I do not yield for speeches.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Just let me make a single remark. have stated in the remarks which I made a short time ago that the lake business, the business of Lake Erie and Lake Michigan, furnishes an immeuse amount of admiralty business, constituting nearly all the admiralty business that comes before the court, and that they will be vastly better accommodated at Cincinnati than at Louisville.

Mr. KNOTT. I yield now to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Mc-CRARY.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to offer an amendment and I wish to inquire of the gentleman if it is his intention to put this bill through under

Mr. KNOTT. Of course not. I have yielded to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCrary.]
Mr. BRADFORD. Will not the gentleman yield to me to offer an amendment?

Mr. McCRARY. Will the chairman of the committee indicate to me to whom he yields the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment now.

Mr. KNOTT. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Bradford,] to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Hopkins,] and to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'Brien.]
Mr. REAGAN. I shall seek the floor in my own right. I think the people ought to be heard on this bill. I have amendments to offer and I desire to debate them.

Mr. KNOTT. I yield now to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr.

BRADFORD ]

Mr. CONGER. I thought the gentleman yielded me the floor.

Mr. KNOTT. I did; but the gentleman declined to take it.

The Clerk read the amendment offered by Mr. BRADFORD, as fol-

Amend by striking out the words "New Orleans" where they occur on the sixth line of the eleventh section of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the word "Mobile."

Mr. KNOTT. I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HOPKINS.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a question of order. I understand that we are in the House, and not in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is not in Committee of the

Mr. REAGAN. I ask, then, that the amendments as they are presented shall be voted on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The Chair finds that there are already two amendments on the table, one amendment to the bill and the other an amendment to the amendment. It is not, therefore, in order to offer further amendments. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama BRADFORD] to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio,

[Mr. Lawrence.]
Mr. GARFIELD. They are different amendments. The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bradford] is not an amendment to the amendment of my colleague.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state that, unless the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bradford] is an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio it is not in order and the question will be first men the adm. Ohio, it is not in order, and the question will be first upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course that must first be disposed of.
Mr. McCRARY. I understood that by common consent gentlemen were to offer their amendments and allow them to remain pending until after the general discussion on the bill, to be voted on after-

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection to allowing that to be done, but I am not willing that a bill of so much importance as this should be taken into the hands of the chairman of the committee reporting it, and the privilege of offering amendments farmed out by him.

have important amendments to offer, and it is due to my constituents that I should have an opportunity of debating them.

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman from Texas will allow me to say that I assured him, although possibly he did not understand it, that when certain amendments had been offered by gentlemen to whom I had promised to yield I would yield to him to introduce his amendments

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state that, in his opinion, it was agreed unanimously by the House that all amendments suggested should be reported and left upon the Clerk's desk for future action. As the point of order has been made, however, the Chair is constrained to sustain it. The pending question is on the mendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. REAGAN. If it will facilitate the action of the House I will withdraw my point of order, with the understanding that I shall have an opportunity hereafter to offer my amendment.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let us have a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. CONGER. For which amendment, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following substitute.

Mr. BANNING. I understood we were first to have a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] my col-

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan offers a substitute for that amendment, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 11 as follows:

Provided, however. That all appeals and writs of error taken, allowed, or sued out under this act from the final judgments or decrees of the circuit or district courts for the eastern and western districts of Michigan shall be taken to the court of appeals for the seventh circuit to be held in the city of Chicago, which court of appeals shall have jurisdiction of all such appeals and writs of error the same as over cases arising within the seventh circuit.

Mr. LAWRENCE. , I make the point of order that substitute is not

Mr. LAWRENCE. I made the permane, as it is moved as a substitute for the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I insist on my point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I have offered this amendment in the nature of a substitute following the amendment of the geutleman from Ohio, so that in case his amendment should not prevail in the House I may have a vote on mine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan insist upon the Chair ruling upon the point of order of the gentleman from Ohio? The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that the substitute is not admissible, not being germane to the amendment which he submitted.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. LAWRENCE. No, I insist upon it.
Mr. CONGER. Then I will go against his amendment.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that while the substitute would be in order as an amendment to the section it is not in order as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CONGER. Then I will offer it as an independent proposition. The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not be in order now except as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio or as a substitute therefor.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I hope the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa will be adopted by the House, that all these amendments may be received and considered as pending, so that gentlemen of the House who feel an interest in these questions may have all the propositions before them, and be able to vote intelligently.

Mr. SAYLER. I insist on the point of order that each amendment must take its own course.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order. I was recognized by the Chair to offer this amendment, which I have done. I was assured I should have that opportunity following the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. I in good faith withheld objection which I might have made in consideration of that offer. I am compelled by the subterfuge or pretense of a substitute to do what was said I should have the opportunity to do openly. I deeply regret that I have been compelled to take that course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already decided that the substitute of the gentleman from Michigan is not germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. Therefore the point of order to which the gentleman from Michigan is now speaking is not well

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that I have been recognized to offer this amendment. I am not speaking to any point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hopes he will not be required to give his decision a third time. The question to which the gentleman from Michigan is speaking is not before the House, as the pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that I have been recognized by the chairman of this committee and the gentleman having it in charge, and also that I have been recognized by the Chair to offer my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs to say to the gentleman that although he has been recognized to offer a substitute, the substitute which he offered has been ruled out of order, and is not therefore before the House. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to make a remark on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio, I have the pleasure of saying now, against his own interest, unable to perceive the drift and bearing perhaps of this amendment, interposes an objection which no other gentleman-

Mr. OLIVER. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Iowa was recognized as having the floor, and I do not know how it is taken from him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection raised by the gentleman comes too late, even if well taken originally.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I can unravel all this thing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONGER. As I have the floor I will call upon the assistance of the gentleman from Ohio when I need it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I was going to withdraw my point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I think you ought not to have made it.

Mr. CONGER. I think you ought not to have made it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That may or may not be.

Mr. CONGER. Now, sir, I was saying that as far as this amendment might be considered in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, it was offered with this understanding, that if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio should fail and the business of Michigan was compelled to go still further south than Cincinnati, to Louisville, I believe I represent the view of the whole bar of Michigan when I request that by this amendment of the whole bar of Michigan when I request that by this amendment provision shall be made for cases arising in the two judicial districts of Michigan; that instead of going a thousand miles to the south they should go to a nearer court of appeals at Chicago in another circuit. Cincinnati itself is not the center of population nor the center of business of that district. A large portion of the business of the dis-trict and circuit courts of that judicial circuit arises from the admi-rally business of the great lakes hereleign these States and connected ralty business of the great lakes bordering these States and connected with the population of the United States. All of that business is in the State of Michigan and the northern part of the State of Ohio. Columbus would be the center of population. Cleveland is the center of the legal business more than any other city in the whole district. Cleveland is the center of the business of the United States courts and that the gentleman, if he were sufficiently zealous, would have found out-instead of its being either at Cincinnati or at that more important city which he mentioned, Bellefontaine. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, from the northern part of Michigan to Louisville is something over fifteen hundred miles. Cincinnati is a trifle nearer, more convenient of access, more truly perhaps the proper center of the business of that district in its approaches and in its situation. Were I sure that the amendment would prevail that would make Cincinnati the place of the court of appeals I should not have offered the substitute. But being informed that the previous question would be cailed before the votes were taken on these different amendments I sought to have this amendment pending.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan to offer it, as the Chair has indicated, as a substitute for the original text. That is clearly in order; not as an amendment to the amendment, there being already one amendment pending, but as a substitute. I desire to have a vote on the general proposition. Mr. CONGER. I can offer it after this amendment is disposed of.

I sought this opportunity of making what remarks I wished to offer. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the entire admiralty jurisdiction of this circuit is upon its extreme northern

Mr. LAWRENCE. Not all.
Mr. CONGER. What else?
Mr. SAYLER. The gentleman forgets the admiralty jurisdiction of the Ohio River, which is very large. He forgets also that a large part of the business of the court are the questions arising out of the internal revenue.

Mr. CONGER. Gentlemen talk of the admiralty jurisdiction and the commerce of the Ohio River. Why, sir, the commerce of the lakes compared with that of the Ohio River is twentyfold—forty fold. There passed through the straits between Lake Erie and Lake Huron, one of the points in this district, more vessels in one summer than pass upon the Ohio River of all kinds in five years. There passed by actual count, through the straits between Lake Erie and Lake Huron 145,000 vessels in the seven months of their navigation, and all ron 145,000 vessels in the seven months of their navigation, and all subject to admiralty jurisdiction. In this round world there is not another strait or river or entrance to a harbor where so many vessels pass and repass as go through the straits connecting the navigation of the upper and lower lakes. And an immense admiralty business grows out of this, and that in this upper northern end of this whole judicial circuit. For six months in the year there is on an average the passage of a vessel through those straits every four and seventenths minutes by actual count. At Cincinnati the entrances and elevances together arount in a year to a trifle over 12 000. clearances together amount in a year to a trifle over 12,000. sages through these straits have averaged over 42,000 a year for the last five years by actual count under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The entries by Sandy Hook and Hell Gate into the harbor of New York are less, I believe, than 15,000 a year.

I refer to this not as being directly connected with this question, but that some of these gentlemen may understand what the admiralty, the maritime, the commercial business is at the northern end of this circuit, before which even the commerce of Cincinnati pales, and before which the commerce of Bellefontaine needs a supporter.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It has a lake near it.

Mr. CONGER. - I do not care, if I have an opportunity to offer this amendment, whether the place for the court of appeals in this judicial circuit be somewhere midway—at Columbus, at Cleveland, or even if it be at Cincinnati, although that is far too much removed from the center of business and is not the exact place where it ought to be. In the other States composing this circuit there are no remain-ing public lands, there are no suits brought into United States courts connected with the public lands. In Michigan there are very many in the course of a year, and very many which might be the subject of appeal.

I do not wish to prolong these remarks. I say in furtherance of what the gentleman from Ohio has said that to compel those two great preponderating States in this district to go any further south than Cincinnati would be a wrong which ought not to be permitted, an expense to litigants, an expense to attorneys, an expense for witnesses and for all who might have occasion to go to that court, which ought not to be imposed upon the people of those States. Therefore, while I shall first assent to the change from Louisville to Cincinnati, if that amendment shall fail I shall ask the House to adopt my amendment to transfer the place for the sitting of the court to Chicago.

Mr. McCRARY. I rose to offer to the House some remarks upon the general subject of this bill, but I yielded for the purpose of amendments being offered, it being my understanding that gentlemen would offer their amendments and no vote would be asked upon them until after general discussion was ended. I desire to address the House on the general subject, and I would very much prefer that the discussion of the amendments in regard to the places in which the court shall be held may be postponed until after general discussion is ended.

I would propose now that before we adjourn this evening gentlemen may be permitted to offer their amendments and that they may men may be permitted to other their amendments and that they may be regarded as pending, to be voted on to-morrow or at some future time, and be printed. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose. No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. McCRARY. I desire to be recognized as entitled to the floor in the discussion, but I yield now for the offering of amendments with the understanding that they are not to be discussed.

Mr. REAGAN. I have some amendments to offer and I do not pro-

Mr. REAGAN. I have some amendments to offer and I do not propose to discuss them now, but at the same time I do not waive my right to discuss them hereafter.

Mr. HOPKINS. By the courtesy of the chairman of the committee I some time ago offered an amendment which is now on the Clerk's desk and which has not been read.

Mr. REAGAN moved to amend section 3 by striking out all after the word "circuit" in line 6 down to and including the word "thereto" in the thirtcenth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the words:

And two judges of said court of appeals, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum of said court, and that the compensation of these appellate judges shall be the same as that allowed to circuit judges of the United States.

Amend section 12 by striking out of lines 8 and 26 the word "ten" where it occurs in each line, and by inserting instead of that word in each line the word "five."

Amend the bill further by striking out section 13.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now ask that the amendment which I sent up some time since be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amend section 11, line 5, by inserting after the word "Philadelphia" the words "and in the city of Pittsburgh, alternately."

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, moved to amend by adding after the word "appeals" in line 6 of section 10 the following:

Or, unless the plaintiff in error against whom a judgment of conviction has been rendered, shall, within the time hereby limited for such writ of error, enter into bond, payable to the United States, in a sum to be fixed by the judge trying the cause, with one or more sureties to be approved by such judge or the clerk of the court, to the effect that he will prosecute with diligence and effect the said writ and abide by and perform the judgment or order of the court of appeals.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, moved to amend in line 6, page 7, by striking out "New Orleans" and inserting instead "Jackson, Missis sippi."

Mr. HOOKER moved to amend in the eighth and ninth lines of section 12 by striking out "$10,000" and inserting "$5,000."

Also, to amend section 3 in line 16 by adding after the words "shall preside" these words:

Provided, The senior district judge shall not preside in any case decided by him as such district judge.

Mr. TUCKER moved to amend by inserting in section 12, line 4, after the word "had," the words "in all civil and criminal cases;" in line 7, after the word "appeals," by inserting "civil cases;" in line 5, by inserting after the word "or" the words "in any civil or criminal cases;" in line 11, after the words "States or," by inserting the words "upon the construction or validity of."

Mr. O'BRIEN moved to amend in section 11, line 6, by striking out

"Richmond" and inserting "Baltimore."

Mr. NEW moved to amend in section 11, line 7, by striking out "Louisville" and inserting "Indianapolis."

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, moved to amend by inserting after the word "Chicago," in line 8, section 11, the words "and Indianapolis alternatively." alternatively

Mr. WILSHIRE moved to amend section 11, in relation to the eighth circuit, by striking out "Saint Louis" and inserting in lieu thereof "Little Rock."

Mr. MAGOON moved to amend section 11, line 11, by striking out the words "first Tuesday" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "third Wednesday."

Mr. PAYNE. I move a substitute for the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] so as to strike out "the city of Louisville" and to insert "the cities of Louisville, Cincinnati, and Cleveland successions."

Mr. SAYLER. Can that be offered as a substitute at this time? I object to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has no right to make

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has no right to make that objection. The House adopted an order permitting amendments to be offered to be considered as pending.

Mr. SAYLER. That is a substitute, not an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are all reported as amendments, to be printed and considered pending before the House.

Mr. HARRIS, ef Virginia. I move to amend section 10 by striking out the first clause of the section down to and including the words "after the entry of such judgment" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: following:

Upon the application of any party alleging that he is aggrieved by the final judgment of a circuit or district court in any criminal action, a writ of error shall be sued out from such final judgment to the proper court of appeals within ninety days after the entry of such judgment.

Mr. PAGE. I move to amend section 11, in relation to the ninth circuit, by inserting after the word "San Francisco" the words "and Sacramento alternately."

Mr. CONGER. If there is no other gentleman to be recognized, I would like to be.

Mr. EAMES. I desire to come next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend section 11 by adding thereto the following:

Provided, however, That all bills and writs of error taken, allowed, or sued out under this act from the final judgments or decrees of the circuit or district courts for the eastern and western districts of Michigan shall be taken to the court of appeals for the seventh circuit, to be held in the city of Chicago, which court of appeals shall have jurisdiction of all such appeals and writs of error the same as over cases arising within the seventh circuit.

Mr. EAMES. I move to amend the seventh section by striking out all after the word "appeal," at the close of the first sentence, to the end of the section.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I move to amend section 11 in relation to the fourth circuit by inserting after the word "Richmond" the words "and city of Raleigh alternately."

Mr. KEHR. I move to amend section 12 by striking out the words

"the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal ques tion of sufficient importance to require that the final decision shall be made by the Supreme Court" and inserting in lieu thereof the fol-

The court shall certify that the judges are divided in opinion upon the legal question involved in such judgment or decree.

Mr. LAPHAM. I move to amend section 11 by striking out the words "in the city of Albany" and inserting in lieu thereof "alternately in the city of New York and the city of Syracuse."

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I move to amend section 11 in relation to the sixth circuit by striking out "in the city of Louisville" and inserting "in the cities of Cincinnati, Louisville, and Nashville, alternately.'

Mr. DURHAM. I move that the House now adjourn.
Mr. SAYLER. Let us lay this bill on the table first.
The SPEAKER. Before putting the question upon the motion to adjourn the Chair will submit sundry requests to the House.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. Wood, of Pennsylvania, was granted leave of absence for one week on account of important business.

Mr. Phelps was granted leave of absence for one week because of pressing business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, obtained leave for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Martin Kelley.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE FOR THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to request of the House on his own behalf leave of absence from and after the adjournment to-day until Monday next, in order that he may give the needed attention to his health.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. Durham, and it was agreed to.

Accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills from the House of Representatives were several read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 2135) relating to the execution of custom-house bonds-to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (H. R. No. 1440) to enable Charles H. Fondé to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of letters-patent for improvement in dredging-machines—to the Committee on Patents.

A bill (H. R. No. 2133) to amend section 10 of the act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending June 30, 1876—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 2134) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Appropriations.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1873.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture:

Whereas from information derived from the Commissioner of Agriculture there are about ten thousand copies of the Agricultural Report for the year 1873 undis-are about ten thousand copies of the Agricultural Report for the year 1873 undistributed: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein,) That the Commissioner of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to each Senator and member of the House of Representatives twenty-five copies of said report, including the number heretofore delivered to members of Congress during the present session.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, recommending that Congress pass an act to authorize the proceeds realized from tolls on the bridge across the North Platte River at or near Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory, to be applied to making necessary repairs; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. SPENCER. I was not in my seat yesterday morning when the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Alcorn] made a personal explanation and had an article read from the Chicago Times. I desire to state that there is no truth whatever in the article. I have never called upon the Chief Justice of the United States relative to the question of his decision in regard to the enforcement act or any other decision. In fact I have never called upon him at all, and never have had any conversation with him upon that or any other subject. I wish to say that the article is false from the beginning to the end.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested to present the petition of James A. Briggs, attorney for others who I understand to be creditors of the Wabash and Eric Canal. He sets out that on the 2d day of March, 1527, the Congress of the United States made a grant of lands to the State of Indiana "for the purpose of aiding said State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Wabash River with those of Lake Erie," provided that the canal when completed shall be and forever Eric," provided that the canal when completed shall be and forever remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from any toll or other charge whatever for any property of the United States or person in their service passing through the same. He sets out further that if it is in the power of Congress by any act of legislation, or through the Supreme Court of the United States, to prevent the sale of the Wabash and Eric Canal from Terre Haute, Indiana, to the crossing of the Ohio State line in Allen County, Indiana, on the 24th instant, at which time the said canal is advertised to be sold. He sets out further that Congress should interfere and prevent the sale of said canal as the sale of the same would be a and prevent the sale of said canal, as the sale of the same would be a wild the State of Said canal, as the said of the same wild be a violation of the terms of the act granting land for constructing the same, would be a breach of faith on the part of the State of Indiana with the State of Ohio, and a great injury, wrong, and loss to persons who invested money along the line of said canal with the belief that the same would be kept up and maintained according to the terms of the grant made by Congress. He claims to represent the interests of the persons along the line of the canal. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine in relation to compulsory pilotage. I move that they be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolutions were read, as fol-

Whereas the exacting of compulsory pilotage fees where no pilotage service is requested or required is contrary to natural justice and imposes an onerous and useless burden on the navigation interests of the State of Maine: Therefore, Resolved, That the Congress of the United States is requested to prohibit by law the exaction of compulsory pilotage in the ports of the United States.

Resolved, further, That copies of this resolve be sent by the secretary of state to the Senators and Representatives from this State in Congress.

SELDEN CONNER,

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky, requesting her Senators and Representa-tives in Congress to vote in aid of the Texas Pacific Railroad. I move that it be read, printed, and ordered to lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the completion of the Union Pacific Railroad has developed a trade with China, Japan, and the South Pacific Islands far in excess of anything bitherto known, and stimulated the productive capacity of the Pacific Slope to an extent beyond its power to relieve by reasonably rapid transportation; and whereas, in the opinion of this body, the proper relief will be found in a competing line constructed farther south, which will, in addition, meet the requirements of increasing growth and material prosperity of the entire southern section of our country: Therefore Resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That our Senators and our Representatives in Congress be requested, if in their judgment such legislation be authorized by the Constitution of the United States and beneficial to the people thereof, to use all proper efforts to secure the passage of an act which, regarding the interests of the Government and the rights of the people properly, shall afford to the Texas and Pacific Railroad such aid as will promote its early completion; and that, while opposed to any further grant by Congress of Government bonds or money to railroads, this body regards the plan of guaranteeing the interest on the bonds of the company by the Government, indemnifying it against loss by a first lien on the road and all its property, including the lands granted by the Government, as the most feasible and proper manner in which such aid can be extended.

Approved February 8, 1876.

By the governor:

JAMES B. MCCREARY.

J. STODDARD JOHNSTON, Secretary of State.

Mr. HOWE. I have been requested to present, and so I do present, a petition which seems to be signed by several citizens of Wisconsin, and which prays Congress to pass a law requiring the Treasurer of the United States to pay to every man, woman, and child residing within the limits of the United States, without distinction of race, or color, or previous state of servitude, the sum of $10 per week, to be paid every Saturday night at the post-office nearest or most convenient to the residence of each such person. There is no limitation as to time; but it provides, by way of preventing an undue expansion of the circulation, that no more than $5,000,000,000 of notes shall be issued in any one year. I am not entirely certain that this would be a wise measure; but I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCREERY. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky, in relation to Mexican war pensions, which I ask to have read.

The resolution was read, and ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to use all honorable means in their power to have an act of Congress passed that will place the surviving soldiers who were engaged in the war with Mexico, and received an honorable discharge, and the wildows of those who have died, upon the same footing, and to receive the same pension, as the surviving soldiers of the war of 1919

Resolved, That his excellency Governor James B. McCreary be requested to send to each of our Senators and Representatives copies of this resolution.

Mandrell, of Attica, Williamson County, Illinois, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth O'Neil, praying for arrears and increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Jules L. Williams, late private Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension on account of disabilities contracted while in the United States service, submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the commit-tee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the peti-tion of Jonathan Lang, late of Company B, First United States Dragoons, praying to be granted a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of J. S. Fennimore, a soldier of the war of 1812, aged seventy-nine, praying that the law be amended so as to allow him a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill

(S. No. 352) to amend an act granting a pension to Sarah S. Cooper, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely. He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William Kelly, praying that he be granted additional bounty in land under the act of March 3, 1855, for services rendered as a soldier in the Seminole war of 1840-41, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs: which was agreed to

Mr. BOOTH. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of A. A. Haynes, praying to be allowed a pension, to submit an adverse report thereon, upon the ground that the case is pending and undecided before the Department.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of George B. Loring, president of the Massachusetts senate, and many others, citizens of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, and New York, in regard to the transportation of live stock upon the railways of the country and praying for some better regulation therefor, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 453) to authorize the Vancouver Water Company to lay water-pipes through the Fort Vancouver military reservation; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 4-4) for the relief of the sureties of J. W. P. Huntington, deceased, late superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 455) for the regulation of Indian affairs; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. By request, I ask leave to introduce a bill. In doing so I wish to say that I do not by any means commit myself to its provisions. It comes, however, from a very intelligent and worthy gentleman, and is an additional contribution to the financial literature of the time. If the bill shall accomplish what its title implies, I think I shall be in favor of it, and I trust the Committee on Finance will properly consider it.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 456) to reduce the interest upon the public debt, provide for a safe and elastic currency, for the speedy appreciation of the value of Treasury notes and national-bank notes to that of coin, and to guard against panics and inflation of bank credits; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 457) authorizing the restoration of Charles E. Boggs to the active list of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 458) for the relief of Jesse McCoy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions,

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 459) for the relief of James Collins; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 460) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue camp and garrison equipage to the several States for use of State troops at the centennial exhibition; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 461) providing for beacon lights on the line of inland navigation from the Chesapeake Bay to the sounds in North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 462) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations and to confirm existing leases," approved February 19, 1875; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (8. No. 463) changing the names of some of the avenues of the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to state that there is an explanatory note accompanying the bill, and I move that it also be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. EATON, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers in the case of Susan D. Anderson, administratrix of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. MERRIMON, it was Ordered, That the heirs of Robert Isherwood have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in relation to their claim.

On motion of Mr. DENNIS, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of John G. Taylor, collector of customs at Annapolis, Maryland, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

SERVICE OF WRITS OF MANDAMUS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 13) to amend the fourteenth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789, which was ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. BOUTWELL. There is a House bill on the Calendar to correct an error in the Revised Statutes. The committee have agreed to report this particular amendment in a general bill. Therefore, this bill it is not desirable to pass. I ask that it be taken up and indefinitely postponed.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 1052) to correct an error in the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, was postponed indefinitely.

PUBLIC SQUARE IN DUBUQUE.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 169, reported by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on the 31st of January. I think there will be no objection to it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 169) giving the consent of the United States to the county of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, to construct county buildings in Washington Square, in the city of Dubuque, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall be glad to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. This bill was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and reported favorably. It simply authorizes the county of Dubuque to erect a court-house in a public square in that city, the consent of the city authorities being first obtained. These public squares were originally laid out by the Government of the United States and reserved for public purposes, and it has been thought by the authorities there that the consent of the United States was necessary in order to use this square as I have indicated. The bill is very well guarded, and I think there ought to be no objection to it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does not the bill vest the title to the square in the city?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; it simply sets apart this square for the purpose of erecting thereon county public buildings, and for no other purpose whatever

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. And that with the assent of the proper city authorities?

Mr. ALLISON. And that with the assent of the proper city authorities.

Mr. DAVIS. Is the property now in any way used by the United

Mr. ALLISON. In no way whatever. It is a public square, fenced in, with gates at the four corners, and the people go in and out at their will.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it kept up and provided for by the city of Dubuque or by the Government?

Mr. ALLISON. It is kept up and provided for by the city of Du-

Mr. BOUTWELL. When this bill was before the Senate a few days since I suggested to the honorable Senator from Iowa and to the Senate that, as far as the nature of the case had then been disclosed, the title to this piece of land, called a park-it being, I suppose, a park in the city of Dubuque—was in the Government of the United States, a perfect title. By an act of Congress it was set apart for a park, but the title remains in the Government. I suppose it can be converted by the Government of the United States to any other use

Mr. INGALLS. By whom was it reserved?

Mr. BOUTWELL. It was reserved by the Government of the United States when it was public land. The title was not parted with, but it was only set aside by an act of Congress for a particular use.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it a military reserve?
Mr. ALLISON. It was reserved as a public square.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It was reserved as a public square.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It was reserved as a public park by act of Congress, but the title is in the Government of the United States. The city of Dubuque I suppose is not only a large and prosperous city but destined to become a very populous one, and the time may arrive when the Government of the United States will need this land for some proper public purpose, not inconsistent, it may be, with its use as a park.

Mr. INGALLS. Are there Government public buildings now in Dubuque?

Mr BOUTWELL. There are public buildings, but then the experience of the country is that the country outgrows its public buildings every ten or fifteen years.

Mr. CONKLING. This is a local matter, and for that reason among others I feel reluctant to interpose in the way of the bill of the Senator from Iowa. I should like, however, to know two or three things about it which I have not heard him state. I take it that the lots in the city of Dubuque fronting on this square have been sold bounded on the square, as is usual; have they not?

Mr. ALLISON. They have, and they are built on entirely around the square.

Mr. CONKLING. What are they, residences or business places ! Mr. ALLISON. Both residences and business places. I see the point the Senator makes.

Mr. CONKLING. I was rather in hopes that my friend could answer the question the other way. I have had occasion to observe somewhat in my own State the effect upon property and upon the people owning it, and also to observe what the courts have said about that effect, of obliterating or occupying open spaces dedicated to the public in any way. I have had occasion to observe that the courts have always taken great pains to preserve and treasure the rights of those who have purchased property bounded by, or fronting upon, or in such situation as to avail themselves of, spaces of this kind. I am aware that this suggestion appeals rather to the interest of the community in the city in question, than it does to the Senate; but it was the first thing that struck me on hearing this bill read.

Then, too, as I understand, this is a valuable piece of property belonging to the United States. Now, if there be some reason why this property should not only be devoted to this use, but why it should be parted with gratuitously, any more than any other property belonging to the United States, I should be glad to know that reason.

I make my suggestions rather as suggestions, than in the nature of objections; because, as I say, I know that it is an ungracious, and at the same time a dangerous thing for any person having no local knowledge about a matter of this sort, to interpose; but I should think that the philosophy of this bill would necessarily carry this Senate hereafter to give away almost any piece of property belonging to the United States which might be desirable to any institution, municipality, or community, or part of a community in the neighborhood in which the property is situated.

I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa, before I sit down, one other question, and that is, whether this property is so situated and of such dimensions that it is very valuable, and how valuable it is?

Mr. ALLISON. I will endeavor to answer the question of the Senator from New York. The first suggestion has of course much force—that is, as to the right of the adjacent property-holders. I have been told that every property-holder surrounding this square has given a written consent to the erection of this court-house upon the square. I have no objection to an amendment being inserted that this consent shall be a prerequisite, if that is deemed necessary. I think perhaps that it would be well, but I understand this consent has already been secured.

Now, as to the interest of the United States in this property: The cities of Dubuque, Fort Madison, and Burlington were laid out under an act of Congress approved July 2, 1836, which I have before me and

That the tracts of land in the Territory of Wisconsin, including the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, in the county of Des Moines; Belleview, Dubuque, and Peru, in the county of Dubuque; and Mineral Point, in the county of Iowa, shall, under the direction of the surveyor-general of the public lands, be laid off into town lots, streets, avenues, and the lots for public use called the public squares, and into out-lots having regard to the lots and streets already surveyed.

Under this authority the city of Dubuque was originally laid out, and there were two public squares set apart. I do not myself see that the United States have any great interest in this property any more than they would have an interest in the streets and alleys of the

Mr. MORTON. Let me ask the Senator a question. Is there any other dedication except that?

Mr. ALLISON. There is no other dedication except this.

Mr. MORTON. And that is not as a public park, but simply as a

Mr. ALLISON. As a public square. The city of Dubuque of course took possession of this public square and has fenced it in as a public park and planted upon it trees, and made through it walks and avenues, so that it is a place where the people can congregate in the

Now there is a general sentiment in the city of Dubuque and in the county that in the center of one of these squares there should be erected a court-house, because it is a convenient place for such a building. When that question was raised, it was suggested by some gentlemen that the county of Dubuque could not erect a valuable building thereon without the consent of the United States being first obtained, and they asked me to secure this consent. If it is thought by any Senator that the United States owns this property, that it has a valuable interest in it which it can sell, then I can readily conceive why there should be objection to the passage of this bill; but I understand

Mr. ALLISON. In my judgment the title is held under the same authority by which the title is held to the streets and avenues of the city. They are set apart for public uses; that is, for city purposes. Perhaps the title may be in the Government of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. If this has been dedicated to the public in that sense that the public has prescribed for its use and has the fee out and out by the presumption growing out of such a state of facts as that, why is application made to the United States for consent at all?

Mr. ALLISON. I presume the application is made here because lawyers in Dubuque are like lawyers elsewhere. They differ as to the construction of the statute. Some say that under this construction the title is now in the city of Dubuque. The only statute on the subject is contained in the fifth volume of the Statutes at Large which I have read.

Mr. CONKLING. Please read those words again.
Mr. ALLISON. The act provides that Dubuque and certain other towns shall

Under the direction of the surveyor-general of the public lands, be laid off into town lots, streets, avenues, and the lots for public use called the public squazes, and into out-lots having regard to the lots and streets already surveyed, in such manner and of such dimensions as he may think proper for the public good and the equitable rights of the settlers and occupants of the said towns.

Dubuque was occupied of course by a large number of people when this authority was given.

Mr. KERNAN. Let me inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether the Government sold the lots around this square on a plot showing the public square?
Mr. ALLISON.

Yes, sir.

Mr. KERNAN. Is it not bound, then, to maintain it for all the

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps it is, unless the owners will consent to the erection of this building.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether the title to this square is in the same condition as the title to the streets of that city? I see that the streets were set apart at the same time by this survey. What is the difference between the title to this square and the title to the streets and alleys of the city, if any? Mr. ALLISON. I suppose they are in the same condition; one being reserved for park purposes and the other for street purposes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Did the Government ever give title in any other way to the streets of that city?

Mr. ALLISON. The Government of the United States authorized commissioners to lay out the town of Dubuque, so called, and they made streets, alleys, squares, town-lots, and out-lots. They sold the lots and reserved these streets and squares; that is all there is of it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then this square is in the same condition as the streets of Dubuque.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir, except that it is used for a very different Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir, except that it is used for a very different purpose. It is used for park purposes, while the streets are used for purposes of conveyance.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, there have been two or three questions asked here, and my colleague will pardon me for saying a word in connection with this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.
Mr. WRIGHT. It is a matter in his own town, and in reference to which I follow him. I am satisfied, from the petitions that have been presented and the requests that have come to us from the citizens of Dubuque, that there is but little, if any, difference of opinion there on the subject. From some inquiries made by the Senator from New York farthest from me, [Mr. CONKLING,] and also his colleague, [Mr. Ker-NAN, I infer that perhaps there may be some difference between the rulings in their State touching questions of this kind and in ours.

In the first place, as I understand this legislation, (and I may be allowed here to state what has been the construction that has been allowed here to state what has been the construction that has been given to it in our State,) it is this: In all the towns in our State save those that are covered by the act already read, the lands were owned either by the supervisors or the commissioners of, our counties, and laid off as county seats, or owned by individuals, and the individuals laid off towns upon lands that they owned, and the fee, the technical fee, remains in the persons who laid out the town so far as the streets or public squares are concerned. The public, however, has an easement or a right of way of course over the streets, and an easement or ment or a right of way of course over the streets, and an easement or right of way, or right to enjoy these public squares or parks that are thus laid out either by individuals or by the authorities of the county. With reference, however, to the towns that are provided for in that act, it has been held uniformly in our State that the technical legal title remained in the Government. That is to say, differing from other towns in our State, with reference to Dubuque, Fort Madison, and Burlington, the technical legal title remains in the Government; because the lands were never sold except as lots were deeded by the Government, and the technical legal title to the parks and the streets remains in the Government: but the right of the public toenion these remains in the Government; but the right of the public toenjoy these public parks and these public squares and the streets is just as complete with reference to these towns as with reference to other towns that were laid out, either by the county authorities or by individuals who originally owned the land. It has been held uniformly, also, that where these public squares were laid out by individuals, if they were meanly designated upon the plate seemblic squares without lies. were merely designated upon the plats as public squares without limitation, then the public might use them for any purpose that was not inconsistent with the easement or the purposes of the dedication.

Now, with reference to this particular public square, I should say, to begin with, that there is no necessary violation of the terms or provisions of the dedication, or the right of the public in it, by the use that is contemplated by this bill; and it is not dedicated or desiguse that is contemplated by this bill; and it is not dedicated or designated as a public park, but as a public square. A question has been made as to whether it would be competent to devote this public square to the uses contemplated by this bill, in view of the rights of adjoining proprietors. I have already said that I think there is perhaps a difference between the rulings in New York and in our State upon that subject. As I remember, by the decisions in New York it would be held there that, if this had been set apart and dedicated as a park, and persons constructed their buildings upon the adjoining lots in view of such dedication, then it would not be competent for the public to divert it or to appropriate it to the use contemplated by the public to divert it or to appropriate it to the use contemplated by this bill. I think the ruling is different in other States on that sub-ject; that, unless there be something in the terms of the dedication that would preclude such other use, then the public may use it for such other purpose, possibly leaving open the question of the liability of the county or the city for damages to the adjoining proprietors. But, so far as this case is concerned, I understand that it is proposed that the bill shall be amended so that there shall be the consent of such adjoining proprietors before the erection of this public building. If that is given, as the Government merely has the naked legal title, as there has been a surrender substantially of everything there is in connection with this land except the holding of such legal title, it seems to me there ought to be but little if any trouble on the part of the Senate in saying that the city of Dubuque, which has largely added to the value of this tract of ground—improved it, inclosed it, put trees there, and made it in every respect desirable—may divert it to the purpose contemplated. When the consent of the adjoining proprietors is given, I do not see why the Government should not consent on its part

Mr. MORTON. I can see no objection to this bill, but I confess I can hardly see the use of it. The language of this grant is as fol-

Shall, under the direction of the surveyor general of the public lands, be laid off into town lots, streets, avenues, and the lots for public use called the public squares.

"Lots for public use called the public squares." A lot used for city offices, public offices, may properly be deemed a public square. If you designate it as a city park, it would be a different thing; but it is a lot for public use, and where it is used for public purposes, for city or county offices, it is directly within the terms of the grant. only effect of this bill, as far as I can see, would be to transfer the title to this land from the city to the county of Dubuque. There was a dedication to the city and not to the county by the act of Congress.

The effect of this would be to transfer it from the city to the country.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suppose that the chief interest of this bill is as to whether the United States will ever require this land for any public purpose. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds examined that question, and had a report from the proper Department that there are already erected in the city of Dubuque all the public buildings which will be required by the Government. Under these circumstances, and regarding it as somewhat doubtful whether the United States had any title to this public square, the committee were in favor of relinquishing whatever title the United States might have.

I should disagree with Senators who have spoken about this place being different from a public park because it is called a public square, as that is a phrase that is often used for these open places that are left to be planted with trees and cultivated as breathing places for a city. But this square is on the extreme verge of the city, and the topography of the country is such that it is impossible for the city to extend much beyond this square, and it therefore is not a great necessity as a public park or a public square; and if the citizens of Dubuque are satisfied to convert this park to the uses of a county court-house, I do not see why the United States should have any objection. It strikes me, therefore, that the bill ought to pass. After these build-ings are erected there will be a large space on all sides that will be vacant, so that it will be almost as beneficial as a public square or park as it is now.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, judging from the remarks of the Senators from Iowa that they have no objection to including the consent of the owners, I suggest that the bill be amended by inserting on line 6, after the word "Dubuque," words which will make it read thus:

The consent of the proper authorities of the city of Dubuque, and also of the owners of property fronting on said square, or heretofore sold by description referring to said square, being first had and obtained.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from New York allow me to ask him whether it would not be better to enlarge that amendment even, and let the citizens of Dubuque by some expression by ballot express their assent to it? Does not the same right which would attach to the lot-holders on this square extend to every individual in the city? It is a public square, and every citizen has the same right in it perhaps that a lot-holder would have.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator think that every citizen of Dubuque could maintain a bill in equity to keep that square open or enjoin erections on it?

Mr. McMILLAN. If the square is dedicated for public use as a public square, I cannot see why every citizen of the city would not have the same right, in nature although not in degree, that the lot-holder adjoining would have.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Minnesota seems to infer that we are granting something. We are simply giving our consent. We have in Iowa courts, State and Federal; and if any citizen there is aggrieved about this square, I suppose he will try and enforce his rights in the courts. I do not think the simple consent of the United States will interfere with his rights, whatever they may be. I quite agree to the amendment of the Senator from New York, however, in reference to the adjacent property-holders; but I do not quite see the propriety of the last clause.

Mr. CONKLING. It is simply to describe the property, that which fronts on the square or by description is located on the square.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I have no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. Where it has been so sold heretofore I mean,

(not what may hereafter be sold,) by description relating to the square. I understand—and I make this remark in answer to my friend from Iowa, [Mr. Wright]—without going into the conflict of decisions in the different States, that the law is and ought to be that a grantor, be it the United States or anybody else, who makes a plot or exhibits an open square, and sells to purchasers bounding or fronting them on that square, is not at liberty afterward by direction or by indirection to close it up, or connive at its being closed up; and I shall be surprised if there is any State in this Union in which a court of equity would not interpose to prevent that. If the United States is a mere spectator here, a mere looker-on, and says "We make no objection one way or the other," this question would not practically

I do not think, from hearing this grant read once or twice, that that the attitude of this case; nor do those who seek this legislation. Therefore, as the Senators think that this will not interfere with their purpose at all, I suggest—though I have no feeling about it and feel no duty resting on me which I have not already discharged by calling attention to the matter-that it would be better to put in these harmless and customary words so that no man shall be armed with a grievance or have a right to say that he was a solitary exception, if he should be solitary, in assenting to this thing being done. And I think it is a little more important in view of other phraseology that I find

The Senator from Vermont has spoken of a court-house, derstand this to be a permission and license to construct "such public buildings," in the plural, "as may be necessary for court purposes and for the public offices of said county;" and if they choose to put up two or five or ten buildings now or hereafter, my understanding of this act is, that the consent of the United States is given to that and that the United States hereby relinquishes to the county of Dubuque, for the purposes here indicated, that is, all the purposes I have described, the title which the United States may have. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be well to incorporate such an amendment as I have suggested, or one equivalent to it, that we may not hereafter ind ourselves charged with an act of injustice.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree to the suggestion made by the Senator from New York, and, as I stated before, I understand that all the adjacent property-holders have given their consent. If they have not, I think equity to them requires that they should be allowed to

Mr. CONKLING. If that be so, this amendment will not require them to give it again; it is simply a recital.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "Dubuque," in line 6, it is proposed to insert:

And also of the owners of property fronting on said square or heretofore sold by escription referring to said square.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that under the Ar. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator from flow that under the language of the grant this square has already been dedicated for public use, and whether it be a park or a public building, that is a public use. The dedication is now complete. By adopting this amendment, you put it in the power of any one property-holder who may own ten feet front to prevent the erection of these buildings; in other words, to impair what is a perfect right already.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt of that, but at the same time I think those who own property fronting upon this square have a right to be consulted, aside from any question of law. I have understood that they have consented to the erection of this public building on this square. If they have not, I am quite willing that they shall be first consulted.

Mr. WHYTE. It occurs to me, Mr. President, that this bill ought Mr. WHYTE. It occurs to me, Mr. President, that this bill ought not to pass in any shape. It appears to have been referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and as a member of that committee I think it proper to say that I was not present at the consideration of the bill, or I should promptly have taken exceptions to it at that time. The act of 1836, dedicating this property to public use, specifically dedicates it for the public use as a public square. To the inhabitants of cities and villages, the use of a piece of land as a public square is too well known to need discussion. It means a place for recreation and for the breathing of the people. Under the terms of this act these squares were set out for that specific purpose, and every occupant of the town of Dubuque has an equitable right and interest in the square mentioned in this bill as a public square. It seems to have been laid out by the authorities of the city of D buque seems to have been laid out by the authorities of the city of D abaque and fenced in as a public park, and called by the name of Washington Square, and has been used since that period by the whole people of that town as a public square. The language of the act shows that that was in the contemplation of Congress when the act was passed, for after describing the different towns in the different Territories where the town lots and public squares should be laid out, it provides that they shall be so laid out "in such manner and of such dimensions as he" (the surveyor-general) "may think proper for the public good and the equitable rights of the settlers and occupants of the said towns." And then at the close of the same section it provides that certain portions or tracts of land upon the river-bank "shall be reserved from sale, (as shall also the public squares,) for public use, and remain forever for public use, as public highways, and for other public uses." These are uses to which every occupant of Dubuque is entitled.

Mr. ALLISON. Now will the Senator allow me to ask him a ques-

Mr. ALLISON. Only the consent of the United States is given by this bill. If any citizen of Dubuque is aggrieved by the erection of a court-house, can he not enforce whatever right he has in the courts of the United States or in the courts of the State?

Mr. WHYTE. The ground I take is that the United States has parted, for the benefit of the whole people of that town, with its title to this land. Now the United States undertakes to exercise a quasi right to take it from the great body of the people, and give it to the county authorities of the county of Dubuque to cover it all over with public buildings, and to destroy it for the public purpose for which in 1836 Congress dedicated it. That is the very point to which I take exception, that this takes this public square in a manner which, if not real, ought not to be taken at all; but in a quasi manner takes it away by giving this consent, from the great body of the people of that city, who are to use and enjoy it as a public square, open and unobstructed, just as the public highways. It stands precisely upon the same footing with the public highways. It stands precisely upon the same footing with the public highways. It stands precisely upon the same footing with the public highways. as well give authority to put the court-house in the public streets of Dubuque as to give authority now to take from the people of Dubuque the right to enjoy this Washington Square as a public park.

We have parted with it; we have given it to the general public; and we have parted with it; we have given it to the general public; and we have no right, even by giving consent, in any manner to indicate that we wish it taken from the great body of the people of the city of Dubuque and given to the authorities of Dubuque County, to fill it up with public buildings for the uses of the county of Dubuque.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word in reply to the Senator from Maydead.

from Maryland.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri had risen. Is there objection to the further consideration of the bill pending at the close of the morning hour? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate but a moment to express my view on this bill, and I am rather astonished to perceive that it is opposed by any Senator, and I think the opposition grows out of a misconception of the subject. Originally the ground on which stands the city of Dubuque belonged to the United States. At the time the city was laid out the property was sold by the United. At the time the city was laid out the property was sold by the United States, reserving certain public squares. These squares were reserved for the public use. The dedication to the public use is in law perfect and complete, and could be enforced not alone by the Federal courts but by the State courts. Therefore the Government of the United States at this time has no title whatever to this property, except in the fact that there is reserved in the Government what lawyers call the fee, the mere naked fee, the ideal fee. The use of the property has passed from the Government to the city of Dubuque and property has passed from the Government to the city of Dubuque and its citizens, and is beyond the control of the Federal Government. Now what does this bill profess to do? This mere naked fee being yet in the Government, it says through this bill and by this bill that it consents that the people who own the use may do with this property as they may think best. That is all. Although it may be true that the use is vested in each and every individual in the city of Dubuque and that on a proper case being made out the courts would enforce his right, nevertheless in all organized governments the public speaks through its organization; and it is impossible to enforce the right of his right, nevertheless in all organized governments the public speaks through its organization; and it is impossible to enforce the right of each and of every individual by his separate action. It must be enforced through the organization of government; and if the State of Iowa, or the city of Dubuque, through its regularly constituted, organized government makes a disposition of this use, it will be binding in law; and I do not know any other way to do it. The right of the individual is understood well, but it is like the right of an individual to step upon one of the vessels of the United States Government. The vessels of the Government belong to the neonle because ing in law; and I do not know any other way to do it. The right of the individual is understood well, but it is like the right of an individual to step upon one of the vessels of the United States Government. The vessels of the Government belong to the people because they are public, but yet each and every citizen of the United States has not the right to go on a Government vessel and say "I am one of the owners and I choose to remain on board this vessel." He cannot do it, although nobody would deny his right in the abstract as one of the people. So it is here. I hold that the Government has no control of this property, and I furthermore hold that this bill is unnecessary excepting to this extent only: If the city of Dubuque were to erect the buildings contemplated by the bill, it would be competent for the Government of the United States through its law officers to file a bill to restrain that erection. That might be done. It would not be done, I am sure; but it might in law be done because it would be the duty of the Government holding the fee to see that the use was held inviolate; that the object for which the use was created was always properly respected. Beyond that there would be no control. There is nothing asked of the Government of the United States here except that it will consent that this thing be done just as the local authorities may think best. We part with nothing which is valuable to us: we give no property upon which we can at any time build or improve, no property which we can sell. All that has long since passed from the Government in the act laying the foundation for the city of Dubuque. We merely give our consent that these people, in whom is already vested the use of this property, may, if they so decide in a proper legal way, declare that this use shall be exercised in the manner herein indicated. All we do is to give our consent. We part with no property; we part with nothing which is worth a cent to us; we part with no property which we have the right to control in any way or dispose

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Iowa suggests, to guard against possible danger, that the amendment had better be changed so as to read "or hereafter located by description upon said square." I should think that was full enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified, and the amendment as modified will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "Dubuque," in line 6, it is proposed to insert:

Mr. COCKRELL. I desired to object to the passage of the bill on account of the last clause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator states that he rose before the bill passed, the Chair will put the question again.

Mr. COCKRELL. The only question was in regard to granting whatever title remains in the United States to the county of Dubuque. Why not grant it to the city, and let the city make arrangements with the county? As I understand the act of Congress which has been read, the title is given to the city for the purposes of the inhabitants of the city. Now let this grant of whatever title may have remained in the United States be made to the city, and let the county arrange its terms with the city.

Mr. CONKLING. But the bill provides that the city shall assent; the assent of the city is required in the bill, which was intended to meet the objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator from Missouri will find that the bill is all right, if he will examine it carefully.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa one question, whether there is any provision in the bill for indemnity to persons whose property lies on this public square for any injury to the property by the erection of the county buildings on it?

Mr. ALLISON. I did not hear the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the vote standing? The Chair hears none, and the bill is passed.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is the report of the committee of conference on House joint resolution No. 52 in relation to the District of Columbia.

Mr. ANTHONY. I gave notice yesterday that I would ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit to-day a few remarks on the concurrent resolution I then presented. As I was unable to obtain the floor in the morning hour, I understand that my friend who has charge of the unfinished business assents to my being heard now.

Mr. SARGENT. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations on leaving the Chamber requested me, when the regular order came up, to take charge of it, stating, however, that he consented to giving way a few minutes to some remarks of the Senator from Rhode Island. do not feel at liberty to violate that arrangement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island will be recognized, the floor being yielded to him for that purpose.

Mr. SARGENT. The regular order is laid aside only temporarily I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Only temporarily.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution I offered yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate. (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the reports in the Congressional Record shall be an accurate transcript of the proceedings and the debates of the two Houses of Congress, and that no speech shall be published therein which was not spoken in the Senate or in the House of Representatives; and such speeches shall be printed as they were actually delivered, except verbal corrections made by the author of the speech, and by no other person; and that when speeches are reserved by their authors for correction, they shall be returned to the reporter of the House in which they were delivered within one week, and, if not so returned, they shall then be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from the original notes of the reporter.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the purpose of this resolution is plain upon the surface. It is intended to make the Congressional Record what it purports to be, what constitutes its value and justifies the cost of its publication. Whatever may be said of the unimportant character of too much of the debates of Congress, as of other deliberative bodies, the importance of the proceedings can hardly be overestimated, and upon these the debates throw great light. They are the proceedings which establish and modify the government of forty millions of free, active, adventurous peole; and whatever makes these proceedings plainer is of high value to the people by whose servants they are transacted.

Objections have been often and seriously urged against the publi-

Objections have been often and seriously urged against the publication of the debates, with the fullness and minuteness which distinguish the reports in the Congressional Record; and it will not be disputed that much of the discussion is irrelevant, and that much which is relevant is tedious; that many things are said which are not worth saying, and that much of that which is worth saying is repeated many times. A German critic once said of a new work: "There is much in this book that is new and much that is good; it is to be regretted that that which is good is not new, and that which is new is not good." This will apply to much of our discussion, which does not therein differ from the discussion of other free legislative bodies. But whatever the measure of chaff in which the two grains of wheat be buried, they are worth finding; and they will be found. And this tediousness, this repetition, this frequent irrelevancy, are inseparable from that free discussion that is necessary to free institutions. It seems impossible to curb the license of debate without interfering with its just and necessary freedom. And although I carry to a degree which I know is a fault the natural impatience of much speaking, and although I have more than once, upon this floor, congratulated you that, in the eternal fitness of things, the obligation to hear had not been made correlative to the right of speech, yet so highly do I esteem that much abused right, so essential do I consider it to freedom and to sound government, that I have never been able to bring my mind to its restriction by any rule, other than those temporary agreements which we make for special occasions, and by unanimous consent. It is better that a question be debated too much than not to be debated at all, and to be passed upon without the light which discussion alone can throw upon it, and without being exhibited in all its forms and from all points of view. The slowness with which legislatures act is among the least of their evils. It is from hasty and unconsidered legislation that the country has most to fear. Nor is the discussion upon a question that is held for consideration in the two Houses of Congress confined to these Halls. consideration in the two Houses of Congress confined to these Halls. The high debate goes on simultaneously all over the land. Our constituents join in it; the press takes it up, and the intelligence of the whole country is brought to bear upon it, till in its final action it speaks not alone with the voice of Congress, but in some measure interprets the "collected will" of the people.

I am, therefore, clearly of the opinion that the Congressional Record should be maintained; that it is worth to the country all that it costs. The debates of Congress show what was the view taken of the proceedings by those who participated in them; they furnish a cotemporaneous interpretation of the intent and meaning of legislation. They record the judgment of those who have gone before, upon many questions that are old, yet ever new, upon the fundamental law, upon the policy of the Government, upon great matters of legislation and of administration. How often have we studied the scantily reported debates in the convention which framed the Constitution, and ported debates in the convention which framed the Constitution, and in the early Congresses, to find the interpretation which the fathers placed upon their work; and of what inestimable value would be a literal report of these discussions, such a report as we have long had of the later ones. We and those who come after us may not flatter ourselves that any subsequent discussions will be as important to posterity; but all that relates to the legislation of a great country, like this, must be of enduring interest to its citizens. And, in that view, the cost of the RECORD is not an item to be taken into the account nor is the more important consideration, the prolongation of debate, the encouragement which the publication gives to debate intended not to affect the votes of those to whom it is addressed, but for the general

But, whatever difference of opinion there may be touching the policy of continuing the Congressional Record, there can be none as to the character of the publication. It should be what it purports to be. Its phonographic accuracy and completeness should mirror exactly what is said and done. It should speak, like a credible witness, "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." Its correctness is the essential quality of its value. If not correct, it is not only useless but injurious; it deceives, instead of informing; it misleads instead of guiding, and throws confusion upon what it undertakes to enlighten. No one will question that the RECORD should reproduce what was said, not what was not said. If the ponderous volumes, of which I apprehend that we shall supply not less than seven before your gavel falls on the closing session, are to be occupied, even in part, with fancy discussion, with speeches that were not delivered, but only that might, could, would, or should have been delivered, the Government might better save the paper.

There is no objection to the publication of addresses which members of either House of Congress may desire to make to their constituents. On the contrary, I have always thought that the practice which prevailed in the earlier Congresses, when the members were expected to issue an address in the nature of a review of their doings, was a healthful one, and that it was badly superseded by speeches delivered on the floor, not with the purpose of affecting the decision of the measure under discussion, but of communicating with the constituencies. But even this is far less objectionable than the publication of speeches that were not delivered. Indeed, if the practice were not frequent, the proposition to print in the RECORD, and as a part of the debates in Congress, speeches that had not been delivered, would be pronounced absurd. This requires neither argument nor illustration. Yet we know the extent to which this practice has prevailed, although not so often in this Chamber, where debate is unrestricted in time, and there is not the same apology, if anything can be an apology, for the singular and indefensible custom. Many speeches not delivered in Congress have been printed in the RECORD as a part of its proceeding. Arguments stand unanswered, statements remain of record, unchallenged, that would not have been listened to without protest and utter refutation. The future inquirer who examines the RECORD to find not only what measures were passed and what were rejected, but the reasons for the disposition that was made of them, finds arguments that were not delivered, and statements of fact that were not submitted to those whose judgments they are theoretically supposed to have controlled.

Nor is this all. A practice, in one aspect even worse than that of publishing speeches that were not made has prevailed in Congress. Speeches that were delivered have been mutilated, altered to make them evade the effect of speeches that were made in reply; statements that were refuted have been omitted or modified, and qualifying remarks that were not delivered on the floor have been inserted in the printed speech. And sometimes speeches that were so completely answered as to make their authors ridiculous have been omitted altogether; thus placing the responding speakers in the attitude of replying to what was not said, and making apparent nonsense of what was appropriate and effective, and presenting the victor in debate as a Don Quixote, fighting wind-mills, or hurling his lance at shadowy giants and imaginary sorcerers. Utter unfairness would be a very mild term for this, and, by permitting it, we made ourselves party to it. And although the bad practice of publishing speeches not made has not been frequent in this Chamber, some Senators—I have in my memory two conspicuous examples of Senators, not now members of the body—have taken speeches for revision, after they were written out by the reporters, have detained them, greatly to the delay and inconvenience of the publication of the reports, and finally refused to return them; while the speeches made in reply to them, and which could not be understood without them, were published in their proper places. This they did, not once only, but in repeated instances. The reporters had no remedy, and the debates of which these speeches made a part, and to the completeness of which, however unimportant in themselves, they were essential, remain in the Globe but half reported.

I remember two instances in which utterances were made on this floor so strange, in one of them it seemed to me so atrocious, that directions were given to preserve the original phonographic notes for comparison with the revision which it was supposed that the Senators who spoke would make of their speeches. In one case, the least noteworthy, the passage, which was objectionable mainly to taste, was omitted. In the other case the speech was held back altogether, until attention was called, I think months afterward, in the Senate to the offensive passage, which was pronounced on this floor to be "revolutionary, unconstitutional, and treasonable." Whether the speech was afterward published or not I have not examined, nor is it necessary to the illustration of the practice. If published at all, it was in the appendix, out of its proper place, and where it would furnish no proper explanation of the indignant protests that followed it. If I may reproduce my own remarks, I will repeat here what I said at that time:

duce my own remarks, I will repeat here what I said at that time:

Mr. Anthon. I think that the practice of making speeches and then suppressing them in the Globe, thereby making those who reply to them appear very ridiculous and their remarks very inconsequential, ought to be stopped in some way or other. I do not understand what right the proprietors of the Congressional Globe or the reporters of the Congressional Globe at our of the congressional Globe and all and the second of the congressional Globe and the previous sessions which have never been printed, and never gone into the Globe at all. I do not know that there is any law or any rule against the practice, but there ought to be one. I think the reporters of the Congressional Globe are bound to print what is said here, and to print it within a reasonable time; and I give notice that unless that is done I shall feel justified in opposing the appropriation for the payment of the Congressional Globe. They agree to publish those speeches; they do not do it; and, if it is their fault, then they ought not to be paid. If it is not their fault, then the reporters ought to be protected, in such a way as that they shall have no discretion in the matter. Of course, if a Senator comes and desires to have his remarks suppressed, it is hardly possible for the reporters to refuse, but they should be protected from the exercise of any discretion in the matter.

What was, or should have been, then, the duty of the publishers of

What was, or should have been, then, the duty of the publishers of the Globe, but for failing in which they had reasonable excuse, perhaps unanswerble excuse, is now the duty of Congress, and for failing in it we have no excuse. The publishers and the reporters had not the power to enforce the prompt return of speeches taken for revision; we have the power, and we should exercise it. We now stand in the place of the publishers of the Globe, for we have undertaken the publication of the debates. A reasonable time should be given for revising the errors of style that are inevitable in extemporaneous discussion. One day is quite enough for this, and the retention of a speech should not be allowed to delay the prompt publication of the Record, nor should anything beyond this be added or omitted. Indeed I am of opinion that the better way would be to publish the debates, every morning, precisely as they took place, with no correction, except in the form of a note. An inflexible adherence to this rule would have some advantage upon the debates, beyond the correct and authentic record of them. I have not, however, ventured to propose so stringent a rule. It might be inconvenient, in the pres ing demands upon the time of every member of Congress who attends with reasonable fidelity to his laborious and multifarious duties.

A speech not delivered was once printed in the Globe by permission of the House of Representatives. I refer to a previous House and to accomplished and recorded proceedings, and I am sure that you will not think the reference out of order, especially as the concurrent resolution refers to both Houses and as the practices which it seeks to correct have been common to both. A member of the House said:

I have prepared some remarks on the duty of the Government to recognize the belligerence of the republic of Cuba, and as I do not desire to take up the time of the House, I ask leave to print my remarks in the Globe.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

The speech was accordingly printed on the following day in the daily edition of the Globe. Instead of an argument for the recognition of Cuba, it was a most outrageous and indecent assault upon a member of this body, a Senator who was recently borne from this Chamber to his place of final repose with every demonstration of public sorrow and of public respect. This assault, utterly unprovoked, without the pretext of reason or propriety of time or place, was a breach of the privileges of both Houses and was so recognized, and was promptly rebuked in the one to which the speaker was responsible. A resolution was passed instructing the Committee on Rules to inquire and report whether the member who made the speech had not abused the privilege, which he obtained, of printing it without delivering it, violated the rules of the House, and deserved its censure; and it was ordered that, until the report of the committee, the speech should be excluded from the Congressional Globe. The speech was not printed in that publication, but it had already appeared in the daily edition of the Globe, as a part of the proceedings of a body which would not have listened to a sentence of it, without calling to order the man who delivered it, and passing censure upon him. And, although this flagrant instance of the abuse of the privilege was brought to the attention of the House, many others which were not indeed indecent, but which mutilated and deformed the record, have passed unnoticed in both Houses.

A less shameful but more amusing example of the abuse of this rivilege occurred in the second session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, and will be found in the Globe of that session, part 4 and appendix, where, within little more than a hundred pages of each other, are two speeches identical, or nearly so, throughout. Neither speech was spoken. In each case leave was given to print. The commencement of the two is:

I am reluctant to claim the attention of the committee when matters of more importance might receive its consideration; but in view of the discussions which have already been had in this Hall during the present session, I desire in an informal and brief manner, to present my views on some of the measures which now engage the attention of Congress and the country.

I have said that both were identical. I did injustice to the eloquent speakers whose thoughts, by a singular mental constitution, were prespeakers whose thoughts, by a singular mental constitution, were precisely alike and found expression in the same words; one obtained leave to print in Committee of the Whole, and the other in the House. One speech, the Globe informs us, was delivered April 24, 1852, "the House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union," the other on the 26th of May, "the House having under consideration the bill to confiscate the property and free from servitude the slaves of rebels." So that the modest "reluctance" of one was "to claim the attention of the committee," while the diffidence of the other was expended upon the House.

dence of the other was expended upon the House.

And this we call debate; this we employ accomplished men to report, at large compensation, to record every word with literal exactness, for the delight of the generation of living men, for the information of posterity. And these speeches are published in other forms, tion of posterity. And these speeches are published in other forms, and circulated among an admiring constituency, to attest the ability and fidelity with which their interests are guarded by those to whom they have committed them, to show the part which their chosen representatives have borne in shaping the national legislation. What a travesty upon debate! How admirably calculated to bring Congress itself into contempt! The purpose of this resolution is to make the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what it purports to be, a faithful record of what is said and done in Congress, and of nothing else; to protect our debates from the indignity which they have suffered by emission in debates from the indignity which they have suffered by omission, in-terpolation, and by the publication of whole speeches that were un-spoken, and that might not have been tolerated, that certainly would not have been unanswered.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the de-bate upon the conference report. I wish merely to explain the mat-ter adverted to by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] last evening, at the close of yesterday's debate. I desire to show that the board of commissioners, while they did pay to the members of the board of audit the amount named in the report, had warrant by the statute passed by Congress; and my interest in the matter ceases there. I do not believe the second statute, under which this was paid and to which I shall refer, was profitable or wise. I think it was like all the legislation with reference to the board of audit—a monstrosity; but there was only one construction for it; and on behalf of the gentlemen who compose the board of commissioners, I make the explanation.

The sixth section of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, limited the official term of the board of audit to the time of their making to the President a full report of their acts and proceedings, to be by him transmitted to Congress on the first day of the session beginning in December, 1874. I will read the clause to which I refer, it being a portion of the sixth section of the act of June 20, 1874, constituting the board of audit:

Said board of audit shall give notice for the presentation of the claims hereinbe-fore specified in such-manner as may be deemed necessary, and no claim shall be audited or allowed unless presented within ninety days after the first publication of such notice; and said board shall make full report of all their acts and proceedings to the President, to be by him transmitted to Congress on the first day of the next session thereof. Each of the said officers constituting said board shall be paid the sum of $2,000 for his services under this act, out of the funds of said District, in addition to his present compensation.

In other words, Congress limited the duration of this board to the completion of the report, which was to be presented to Congress in December, 1874. That that is a fair construction of it I will show by the language which Congress used in continuing the board afterward. For the services which its members thus were to give, and which were limited in time by the presenting of the report, they were to receive the sum of $2,000, not per annum, but, as it is stated, for their services under this act, each one of them, there being two members of the

Their pay, then, for this service was $2,000, or, as calculated by the board of audit, $12.6542 per day from the 1st day of July, 1874, when they organized, to the 5th day of December, when the report was made, being one hundred and fifty-eight days. The joint resolution of Congress approved December 21, 1874, in its first section, provides:

That the board of audit constituted by section 6 of the act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, be continued until otherwise provided by law—

If their powers and duties had not terminated by the previous act of Congress, why continue them? They are continued "until otherwise provided by law "- with all the powers and duties specified in said section, and with compensation to the members of the board at a rate proportioned, according to time, to that granted in said act, and payable as therein provided.

Then it goes on with some other provisions extending the time within which claims may be filed. I have not looked into the legislative history of this resolution to see who was the author of it, who reported it, or who was responsible for it. I simply say that it was very careless legislation, but it is a fair construction that it provided that they shall receive the same pay, proportioned as to time, that was fixed by the previous law, and that the board of commissioners who were required to pay this sum, because it was payable out of the funds of the District, were justified in the construction which they put upon it.

Now, if my friend from Massachusetts will look at the figures he will ascertain that the amount reported as paid to these two gentle-men exactly makes out the amount of additional days they served, men exactly makes out the amount of additional days they served, embraced in that report, multiplied by the per diem procured in the manner of which I have spoken, except that the sum of $400 was embraced in the previous year, not the year 1875, and is added to make up the total of $9,260.64. With that exception, which of course comes under the same rule, the per diem for 1875 was ascertained in the way I have stated, and the figures, as I find by calculation, make that

That is the explanation which I think due to the commissioners, who find this peculiar law in our statute-books as I think have properly construed it. I might say that would be a reason why we should at once abolish the board of audit, that this per diem runs on in that way. I am inclined to think it is a good reason. I believe that this compensation as now provided by this statute is extravagant, enormous. These gentlemen receive from their pay as Comptrollers of the Treasury about $5,000 a year, and this amount, which they receive under this additional act, is about $4,000 or more, making in all between nine and ten thousand dollars a year.

I should like to say in justice to the committee of conference that any words continuing for any purpose the board of audit were not the motion of the members of the Senate committee. I suppose I have a right to say that. As I said yesterday, the amendment was prepared by the members of the House, they objecting to the abolishment of the board of audit, because they said they wanted to retain it in an organized form, as their House were investigating the board of audit, and if its organized form were destroyed they would lose the facility for carrying on that investigation. After considering that argument, I allowed it to overcome my objections; and I did not think it stood in our stead to object to the continuance of the board for that purpose, especially those who might have the opinions which I had expressed on the floor in reference to these matters. I believed the board of audit as originally constituted was improperly made up; that its functions were allowed to be devolved upon subordinates not named; that it was authorized to pick up anybody it saw fit, and devolve its whole duties upon him. As I have said to the Senate before, I say now, I stood originally objecting strenuously that it was careless legislation, that it might lead to fraud, that it was apt to do so, and that we ought to amend the bill in that particular, and put this whole business under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, and make him responsible for all these proceedings. So far as I am concerned, the sooner the board of audit is abolished the better it will be for me; but I do think that it is not just for Congress to leave affoat a difference of a million of dollars between the amount of certificates and unaudited accounts and the bonds, that it is repudiation to do so.

My objection to this report is not that which has been stated by some other gentlemen, but because we do, in my judgment, speaking with deference to those who differ with me, repudiate by it our obli-

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from California if he has stated the exact amount of the bonds that are now outstanding?

Mr. SARGENT. I have not on this occasion, but the figures are

Mr. SAMOENT. Thave not on this occasion, but the lightes are here and at the service of the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am informed by the gentlemen who compose the sinking-fund commission, several of whom are known to me as persons of as good character as anybody there is left in this bad world anywhere, that all the bonds they have issued, dollar for dollar, are accounted for by certificates, which as they understood the law they were compelled to issue bonds upon; and the certificates of course were compelled to issue bonds upon; and the certificates of course are ready to be produced; that the sum that they have actually issued of bonds altogether, now outstanding, is $13,743,250; that, instead of making haste to issue bonds when this bill had passed the other House, they stopped issuing bonds, and passed a resolution to that effect, only issuing (if you can call it issuing) bonds that had before that time and before the question was brought up in the House of Representatives at all about stopping operations been called for by of Representatives at all about stopping operations been called for by certificates that had been presented to them for conversion, and which, as they were unable to issue the bonds, on due care and examination, fast enough, they had made a register of, and had promised the bonds to the holders of the certificates, as they of course were obliged to do. Therefore, in substance and effect, no bonds at all for any purpose have been issued since this consideration in either House of the matter has been brought forward, although as a literal fact some bonds have actually left their office since the matter was under debate, but not since the bill came here, as I understand, but as I have said bonds that were already in effect issued, and were only in the course of preparation for parties who had applied and who were registered as applying for the bonds for the certificates. This being the case, I think no criticism at all can be made upon this board of audit for any action that they have taken in the parties who have the control of the certificates. that they have taken since this matter was brought under considera-tion unless it may be the criticisms of citizens who held certificates for which they could not get bonds when they applied after this discussion had been commenced.

While I am up, Mr. President, I feel bound to say besides, in respect of all this business, what perhaps I have said before, that, as much as I believe the commissioners of the District of Columbia have gone too far in the expenditure of money, (not as in violation of law, but as a matter of expediency,) I think we ought not to forget the condition in which they found this District when Congress put them into possession to administer its affairs. Miles and miles of streets were torn up; sidewalks torn up; things stripped and carried away; and there was an utter state of dilapidation and ruin, if things were left in their then condition all over the city. Anybody can readily see that when citizens would be applying to them to redress, as it would be, the wrong that had been committed on them by pulling up the streets and turning everything upside down and leaving them in that condition, they went forward, and, to make what they were doing useful, very likely in some instances they went beyond the strict letter of completing an existing work, in order to bring existing works into connection with other streets that had been finished. But with all the criticism that I have pronounced upon the operations in this District for several years, I feel bound in candor to say this that I am now saying, that we ought to have a pretty charitable judgment in respect to matters of expediency in the conduct of these gentlemen who are commissioners when we look at the condition of things that they found themselves placed in and the difficulties they had to face. I have no doubt that they have all acted, as they thought, within the law and with the best intention toward the public good. That they have carried up the debt to a sum that is quite large enough for all practical purposes, we all agree, and we have provided they shall carry it no further; but as far as it has gone, of course it is impossible for us to go back upon it and refuse to provide for the bonds, as we have pledged ourselves to do; and of course we shall be obliged to provide in some way for the payment of these certificates, for they are an obligation of the District of Columbia, in some way, and it is are an obligation of the District of Columbia, in some way, and it is the duty of Congress unquestionably as the governing power to see to it that the creditors of this District get their pay, by imposing taxes enough upon the property of this District to enable the proper officer to pay these claims. It must be done. There cannot be any doubt about it. A government would not be worth the name that did not provide for justice to its citizens or to citizens of other countries who had claims against mynicipalities or retain countries who had claims against municipalities, or states even, as far as we had any constitutional power; but of course we have no power against the States. Here we have the power, and it is our plain duty, and speedily, as I think, to make some provision for paying the honest debts that are still outstanding against this District.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I had great confidence last night that the Senator from California would be equal to the occasion, and that there would be some explanation given of the condition of things as it appeared in the report; and it is fair that I should say that I believe the Senator has given the correct explanation of this condition of things. While all of us thought that the sum total which this board of audit was entitled to was the gross amount of $2,000 each, or $4,000 in all, for the temporary work of auditing these accounts, if appears that after having obtained that, they were allowed in addition to their regular salary of $5,000, as I believe it is, a sum of about $4,500 a year that there did not appear to be any explanation of. Now, however, it seems that the genius of man has been summoned to the work of putting upon the statute-book a form of words that entitles these men, whether they have a single hour's work to perform, until Congress otherwise orders, the addition to their regular salary of the sum of about $4,500 a year; and it is proposed by this report of the committee of conference to continue that after having divested them of all power to do anything else. After there had been put upon the statute-book, as I say, what was considered sufficient compensation for them in a gross sum of $2,000 each to perform a work which the statute provided should be terminated on the 1st of December, 1874, this phraseology was afterward put in a joint resolution: The board of audit shall be-continued until otherwise provided by law with all the powers and duties specified in said section, and with compensation to the members of the board at a rate proportioned, according to time, to that granted in said act.

That is to say, as the time from the 20th of June to the 1st of December is to the sum of $2,000, so the time that they shall be continued in existence hereafter shall be to the fourth member of the proportion the amount which they shall receive. I understand the Senator from California to say that they ascertained it in this way: They took $2,000 and divided it by the number of working days between the 20th of June and the 1st of December, and called that a per diem, and then for the whole of the year 1875 they multiplied the number of working days by that per diem thus found. I think the statute is open to that construction; but the genius of the man who devised it is worth putting upon record. Mr. SARGENT. That I think myself.

Mr. DAWES. And I suggest that it is but of a piece with that sort of construction of the temporary statute which called them into existence, that stretched the contracts that were made by the board of public works all over the city, and allowed one which covered but a single square on Capitol Hill to be turned into a contract to take up cobble pavement in a private alley and supply it with a concrete pavement, miles off.

Now, sir, this may be a small matter; it may appear to the Senate to be a small matter; but there are other eyes upon this than ours; and for one I do not intend myself to take any portion of this load upon my shoulders any further. I suggest that now, since the Senator from California, as one of the committee of conference, has become converted to the necessity of putting an end to this board of audit and to this anomalous method of compensation, it is due to the subject that he should ask that this report be recommitted to that committee, so that they can provide for the termination of this state of things. On what ground can it be justified that these two men, with nothing in the world to do but to be investigated as the Senator from Maine says by the House of Representatives, must be paid therefor, in addition to their established salary as officers of this Government, the sum of $4,500 a year each?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator yield to me for a simple inquiry whether the Senator will not attain the object he has in view by the adoption of this report and then rely upon the investigation which is now taking place by the House of Representatives into the transactions of this board, which, of course, would cover the very item which has attracted his attention at the present time? As I have already stated, the reason of this provision in the report was that they should not be beyond the reach of the committee of the House of Representations. sentatives that was investigating the subject. I do not know how much importance may be attached to that, but it was thought necessary that importance may be attached to that, but it was thought necessary that their status should be preserved so long as they were being examined by a committee of the House of Representatives. Now, how rapidly they are advancing in this work of investigation I do not know; but undoubtedly this very matter would attract their attention, I submit to my honorable friend; and, if that could be done, I submit whether that does not reach what he aims at by a recommittal of the report.

Mr. DAWES. Neither the Senator, nor myself, nor anybody I am acquainted with can tell what will be the result of any investigation that is going on elsewhere or when there will be any such result; but we do know this, that we have before us at this very moment here the condition of things that the Senator from California says has satisfied him that this board of audit ought to be abolished at once and this compensation stopped.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator will allow me to remark that I stated that to be my opinion at the very start, and I simply gave way to the argument urged on this point, merely as to this circumstance. I do not think the board of audit can be shown to be responsible for this item, little confidence as I have in them. The Congress that passed the resolution which has been so construed is responsible for that resolu-

Mr. DAWES. I know Congress is responsible for that resolution, but I have failed in the discussion thus far to find anybody who is willing to take the responsibility of any of the acts of the District government or of that government which was put in the place of it, which has brought so much scandal upon the administration of public affairs here, and we find an unwillingness to correct the evil. We find a disposition in every one who takes hold of this work of correction to so bind it up in words and indirection and involution that it can only be understood with the greatest difficulty. I do not know what is more simple and direct if we believe that this board of audit ought to terminate, that its compensation ought to cease, than to say so.

Now, the distinguished Senator from Maine proposes, instead of saying so, after having satisfied ourselves that it ought to be so, to let it go on as it is indefinitely, in the hope that somebody else, over whom we have no control, and for whose actions we are not responsible, and whose actions we do not inspire, may do that which we ourselves are unwilling to do here, namely, to investigate and demonstrate to their own body the propriety of terminating this condition of things that they will be willing to do that which I do not think the Senator from Maine even will say ought not to be done now. I do not see why we cannot at once pass upon the question. If there is anything for this board of audit to do after they have passed upon the limited amount of claims prescribed in this bill, except to stand up and explain and justify according to law what they have done before such tribunal as has authority to arraign them, I do not know what there is left for them to do; nor do I know what necessity there is for them to be continued a board for that purpose, at the rate of $4,500 a year additional to their compensation from the United States. I desire myself to make it plain what is the reason why I think this condition of things has gone on long enough.

condition of things has gone on long enough.

The people of this country think there is more at the bottom of the administration of affairs in this District of Columbia than the Congress of the United States have been willing to put npon the record. They think the disposition of the Congress of the United States is to go along without probing these things to the bottom. The Congress of the United States has been willing to say that such has been the character of the administration of the old board that it ought to stop instanter, and that it would provide temporarily for the administration of affairs until there shall be a new, a permanent, and better government of this District, and in the attempt to do that the people believe that Congress has been thwarted by construction the wildest and the strangest, as it appears outside of these Halls at least, that could be possibly put upon statute. And here comes up, at the last moment, after a delay of twenty-four hours in the discussion of this report, the fact that the continuation of this board of audit, for no other purpose in the world than for them to vindicate if they can their own official conduct, involves us indefinitely in this amount of money. I think, then, that if the Senator from Maine is satisfied, as his suggestion would seem to indicate, that this board might as well be dispensed with, he had better so provide now while he has the board under his control and not pass it over to some other body to determine whether in their opinion, at some future period, they will think as he and I do now.

their opinion, at some future period, they will think as he and I do now.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, having participated in the debate yesterday, and having further considered the nature of the report of the committee of conference, I am confirmed in my judgment that by adopting the report of this committee the Senate will have reversed their decision upon the bill at almost every stage during the time it was before them. The present report continues a system of audit and issue of certificates which are to bind this District and through this District the Treasury of the United States to a very much larger amount than at present is due. I shall endeavor to make the Senate see what I believe I see are the real facts of the case upon which we are called upon to you.

the Senate see what I believe I see are the real facts of the case upon which we are called upon to vote.

On the 26th day of January, 1876, bonds of the District of Columbia, for the payment of the principal and interest upon which the faith of the United States had been pledged by law, had been issued to the amount of thirteen million seven hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars. It was found that a system of audit had prevailed under which a sum of money amounting to over $5,000,000 in 1874-775, and proposed to be equaled or exceeded in 1875-76, had been audited and certificates allowed under which the sinking-fund commissioners felt themselves compelled to issue the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia guaranteed by the United States without any limitation whatever. This system of audit was taken up here and examined in the Senate. Illustrations of the manner in which claims were audited, in which contracts were paid tenfold the amount of the original proposition of the contractor, paid tenfold and more than tenfold after they had been returned as completed contracts and settled for in full, were presented. Instances were read by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, others by me, from the published reports of the commissioners of the District to show this extravagant and loose system of auditing claims and issuing certificates. Upon those facts the sense of the Senate seemed to proclaim that they should pause, and that such a system of audit should continue no longer. Therefore it was that, in the language of the bill as it reached the commistee of conference, it was provided:

That the board of audit created by the act for the government of the District of Columbia approved 20th June, 1874, is hereby abolished, and shall immediately upon the approval of this resolution transmit all the books and property in their possession belonging to the District to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and make a report of their proceedings not hitherto made.

There was the first essential, sensible step to prevent further abuse of the existing laws or further misapprehension of the provisions of existing law, or, what is certain, further expenditure of the money of the people of the United States, whether by authority of law or not. This was the emphatic declaration of the sense of the Senate, that a system of audit so loose, so imperfect, leading to such ruinous results, should be instantly arrested, and they provided for it. That proposition, plain, necessary, distinct, and proper, the committee have seen fit to abandon, and they have in abandoning it given up the direct expression of the Senate's will on the subject. The question is whether that which was in the opinion of the Senate right and proper a week ago shall be considered wrong at the present time.

What else was done? In the same section and by the same emphasis the Senate declared "that this resolution shall not in any way or manner recognize the liability of the United States to pay either the principal or interest of any of such bonds as may have been issued on or since the 27th day of January, 1876." That was a notification, and a very proper one, to the world that the credit of the United States should not be affixed to any obligation for any other debt than that which had been audited at a certain time. The two propositions combined made one, and that simply was that the amount for which the credit of the United States should be pledged should be the amount audited and for which bonds had been issued at a certain date, and not increased by the lapse of time; and that the board of audit under whose administration such a system of allowance of claims had been permitted should no longer have that power, but should cease to exist, and their books and papers should be passed over to the custody of the commissioners of the District.

Both of these essential features of the bill, both of these declared designs of the Senate, have been thwarted or sought to be thwarted by the action of the committee of conference. The question for the Senate to decide is, shall we continue this board of audit; shall we permit the debt of the people of the United States to be increased some thirteen or fourteen hundred thousand dollars more than it was on the 26th of January, by a system of audit which has shown itself incapable, to say the least, of discriminating between just and unjust claims upon the people of the District or upon their sponsors, the claims upon the people of the District or upon their sponsors, the people of the United States?

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Eaton] was conspicuously right in supposing yesterday that this report of the committee of conference had yielded every substantial amendment which the will of the Senate had put upon the proposition of the House of Representatives. Talk about this being a compromise! The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Davis] spoke yesterday of my not understanding the surroundings of the committee. I confess that I do not understand the surroundings of the committee. I understand the measure that went to the committee; and I believe I am competent to understand the powers and duties of a committee of conference; and I also understand the power of the body to whom they report over their action; and where the committee of conference have deliberately given up every amendment that expressed the will of the Senate in regard to this exceedingly important measure, it seems to me a plain thing that the Senate are bound to recommit that measure to them, or to raise a new committee in order that the will of the Senate may in some respect be carried out. I do not choose to vote in the dark myself; I do not choose to have those who care to listen to me vote in the dark on this subject. They will understand plainly that by voting for the report of the committee they do vote to continue this system of audit; they do vote to make it possible for the auditors who have so improperly swollen the debt of this District and the debt of the people of the United States to increase it by some thirteen hundred and odd thousand dollars more than it was on the 26th day of January 1876.

I expressed my regret yesterday and on one occasion prior to that, that the Senate struck out the provision of the House giving notice to all men that the law had been violated under which these bonds were pretended to have been issued, and that the Government of the United States would only hold itself bound to that good faith of any principal who stands by the act of his duly authorized agent, provided that agent acts within the purview and scope of his legitimate authority. Such would be the rule that we would lay down for ourselves. Such is the rule that equity and personal honor lay down for all men's private conduct. Such is the rule, and nothing further, to which I would hold the Government of the people and the public obligation over which my voice here has some small control. Therefore it is that I trust the Senate will understand precisely what is the effect of concurring in the report of this committee of conference. If, after hearing what has been said in debate on the subject, they choose to say that by concurring in this report they reverse their action as testified by their votes of a week or so ago, it is their pleasure and not mine; but it will not be done without my vote at least being put on record against it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I really feel embarrassed, by the

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I really feel embarrassed, by the aspect of this question, how to vote. If we prolong this discussion and send this bill to a new committee of conference or recommit it to the same committee which would be the proper thing, perhaps, we continue the open violation of the public faith which has gone on since February 1 by our refusing to pay the interest on these bonds, which we have expressly agreed to pay. That is no slight consideration and no slight charge to be made against the Government of the United States. For more than two weeks it has failed to pay the money that it expressly stipulated to pay and which it now acknowledges itself to owe to individual creditors of the United States. This bill, if it is passed, will at least pay the overdue interest on $13,740,000 of bonds outstanding.

On the other hand, if we pass this bill and thus do justice to these creditors, we do an act of gross injustice to another class of public creditors who stand on precisely the same footing except that they have not the bonds but only certificates of indebtedness. This bill will keep out in the cold creditors who hold your certificates of indebtedness to the amount of $900,000, according to the statements made to us, who are entitled under the law as it now stands to demand of and receive from the sinking-fund commissioners their bonds. This bill it you pass it takes away from them that right. It seems to me that to do this without reason and without cause is a violation of the public faith.

It has been said that some of these certificates have been issued foolishly, wrongfully, fraudulently. If that is the case, you have the naquestioned right to recall those certificates and to refuse to pay them. But the great mass of these certificates are unimpeached by any such suspicion of fraud. The commissioners of the sinking fund, who have been eulogized here and I believe are all honest men, say that of the certificates that are now outstanding over $300,000 were actually on file in their office before the 1st of January and before the subject was even agitated in the House of Representatives; that bonds were not issued for them simply because on account of the pressure of business they could not issue them, but the certificates were filed and no question was made against them. They were there and the creditors had the right to demand the bonds, but by reason of the pressure of business they were not issued. It is not controverted that the great mass of these certificates are honestly due to the creditors, but it is said some of them have been issued improvidently by our agents, under our authority. I ask if you suspend the whole of these obligations, ought you not in the law making this suspension provide for the payment of the honest creditors of this Governsion. ment and of this District, even when you suggest that some of them are dishonest? What right have you to suspend the legal rights now conferred by law on a public creditor, merely because some other creditor holds a suspicious claim, or perhaps has received a certificate for more than his due?

It seems to me that this presents a difficulty which Senators have not met, and that this bill itself ought to contain some provision by which certificates that are undisputed, unquestioned, and unquestionable shall be promptly paid, and only those that are controverted suspended from payment until an inquiry can be made. It is no light thing to charge the Government of the United States with violating its law and recalling its law which gave to these creditors a right to a bond with interest merely because some of the claims included in this category are suspected of fraud or of being too large sums or of having been issued improvidently by our own agents.

Sir, in either aspect, if we pass this bill as it now stands, we violate our obligations to those who hold our certificates. If we refuse to pass the bill and keep it longer suspended between the two Houses, we continue the open and palpable violation of the public faith which has I believe now for the first time occurred in the history of our Government. This is the first time, so far as I know, in the history of the Government of the United States when a coupon due on a bond of the United States has not been met promptly at maturity; and yet we continue that state of things.

The discussion between the Senator from California and the Senator from Massachusetts has disclosed that under the law as it now stands—I do not know who framed the law—a grossly exorbitant compensation is given to two public officers whose function is continued for some purpose by this bill. Whatever may be said of these gentlemen, and no man has more respect for them than I have—especially for the First Comptroller—I think a law which gives to each of them $4,500 a year in addition to his annual pay as Comptroller is wrong. I have great respect for both the Comptrollers, but the gentleman newly appointed as the Second Comptroller I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with. With the First Comptroller I have. The old Second Comptroller resigned some time since, and the Second Comptroller now in office I have not the pleasure of know-I have no doubt he is entitled to all that can be said of him. But it is not right for these gentlemen, officers of the Government, to But it is not right for these gentlemen, officers of the Government, to receive $4,500 a year for doing nothing, and it is manifest that under the law, as long as we continue the board of audit, they are entitled to the compensation which has been paid them. Should we continue the board of audit? On that ground alone, I think we ought not. It strikes me on the whole that, while it is a bad thing to prolong this discussion and keep this bill hung up between the two Houses, and thus continue the time when we refuse to pay the interest on the public debt, yet the committee of conference that was appointed by both Houses could promptly agree that under this aspect of the by both Houses could promptly agree that under this aspect of the case we ought at least to cut off the board of audit so as to prevent this salary from continuing along until the whole of these matters are settled. Perhaps they might make other modifications that would give more satisfaction to both Houses. I am in hopes that when they come to reconsider this subject they will see if they can-not provide for the honest creditors who hold the certificates of indebtedness, and leave only in dispute those which are charged with having been improperly issued. The investigation must have gone far enough to show which of these claims are dishonest, which are under suspicion; and they can authorize the commissioners of the sinking fund to issue bonds to claimants who are fairly and honestly and without dispute entitled to them, keeping in reserve only those that are disputed or controverted. At all events, this report ought to furnish some tribunal to say which of these claims shall be paid and which shall not be paid.

Now, Mr. President, under all the circumstances, I move that the report be recommitted to the same committee of conference. They have had the benefit of the discussion, and they will see exactly the points on which the Senate hesitates and will no doubt promptly correct them. The matter ought to be passed. The only hesitation I have had is that I do not want to prolong for an hour or for a day the present condition of this bill; but if the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] will acquiesce in this motion, I think, when he reports it to-morrow with some modifications, we can all agree to pass the bill. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I understand the question to be on the motion to recommit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. OGLESBY in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio moves that the report of the committee of conference e recommitted to the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On that motion I wish to say a single word. I should dislike extremely to have the report recommitted except upon such definite ideas as that the committee might understand that they were in the way of instructions when they came to consider the question. There is one single feature brought to my attention which induces me to believe that possibly it may be considered by the Senate wise to recommit this report. The Senator from Vermont has called my attention—and I do not know but that the Senator from Massachusetts may have referred to the same thing-to the fact that the repealing clause in the committee's report does not perhaps necessarily cover the act of the 21st December, 1874. Candor requires me to say that the committee did not have that act in view. It will be seen that the repealing clause has reference to the act of June 20, 1874. Now, the act of December 21, 1874, recites the act of June 20; but it is suggested that the language used in this report does not necessarily repeal or act upon the act of December 21, 1874. I am not clear that that may not be so; and, if that is so, then the report in that particular ought to be amended, and to that extent it seems to me a recommittal may not be improper.

But I wish to make a general remark for the ear of the Senate touching the subject-matter which may fall under the action of the committee if it should go back. Certain things have been definitely decided by the two Houses, and which it was intended to decide, so that a committee of conference must observe them. First, the two Houses have decided that there shall be no more bonds issued until further orders. Both Houses have concurred in that decision, and any action which may be contemplated by the Senate which interferes at all with that condition of things, it seems to me is altogether mistaken. No such proposition as that certainly could be entered into by a committee of conference without ignoring entirely the judgment of both branches of Congress. Therefore, I hope that this report will not be recommitted with any idea that the committee will take that under consideration; and yet the remarks of my honorable friend from Ohio would contemplate that.

It is true, as the Senator from Ohio states, that there is a large amount of this indebtedness not carried into bonds, remaining in certificates, and it would seem, as he argues, that as a matter of good faith we should require that some disposition be made of those certificates; and yet both branches have decided against that. Why then send it to us? Why then recommit it to this committee with the expectation that we will do precisely what both branches have determined, if they can determine anything, that they will not allow us or allow anybody to do? If I understand the action of Congress, they have determined that there shall be no more bonds until such time as they are authorized by the future action of Congress. All that debt, therefore, to which my honorable friend refers, must remain, unless both branches choose to retrace their steps. It must remain, I repeat, until Congress takes future action.

The next point settled by Congress, and which the conference committee regarded, was that the certificates were not to exceed $15,000,000. There can be no object in recommitting this matter to the committee for the purpose of examining claims to go into cer-tificates if it is contemplated that they are to go beyond that amount. Therefore I can see no necessity on earth for recommitting the re-ort except on the supposition that the committee has not made it so definite and clear that it covers both the acts of which I have spoken as they ought to have done; that is to say, the report contemplates the act of June, 1874, and it is said in terms it does not embrace the act of the following December. I am in doubt whether it does or not. At any rate, the technical construction of it would not embrace it. Whether that is of practical importance enough, considering all the circumstances, to send the report back to the committee the Senate must judge; but I agree with the Senator from Vermont that it is open to that objection.

There is one other consideration, and only one, which may be an inducement for the Senate to recommit the report. The Senator from Massachusetts says substantially that the board of audit ought not massachusetts says substantially that the board of audit ought not to be continued one moment after the discharge of the duty devolved by this bill, if I understand him, which is simply to audit a limited amount of claims, not exceeding $200,000. If there were no other consideration about it, of course that ought to be absolute; but at the time the committee drew this report the question of salary or compensation to the board did not occur to them at all. The idea was, of course when the duty ceases when the saving ceases the salary of course when the duty ceases, when the service ceases, the salary ceases; but a construction which has been put upon the law, and circumstantial facts which have been brought out since, perhaps would have given a different shape to the report in that respect. Then the have given a different shape to the report in that respect. Then the only thing about it is whether it is of consequence enough to send it back to the committee in order to have it corrected so that at the end of the duty herein prescribed their functions shall wholly cease, and the board itself expire. That would be a reasonable construction and a proper thing to do, if there were no other element in it; but my honorable friend from Massachusetts either attaches no importance to the fact, or he overlooks it, that the very inspiration of this provision on the part of the committee was that it was important to keep the board in existence until their proceedings had been examined into by the House of Representatives through an investigation which is now in

House of Representatives through an investigation which is now in progress. I suggest, then, if this is sent back, whether it would not meet the views of the Senate that after the limit of these labors, say sixty or ninety days, all compensation shall cease.

Those are the only two considerations that occur to me, and I make this statement so that if the report does go back to the committee, the Senate shall not be taken by surprise by any consideration the committee may give to the subject. These two points, I repeat, are the only things that occur to me that come at all within the range of a conference committee upon the action of the two Houses of Congress

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that I quite understand the Senator from Maine. Am I to understand him to state that there will still be outstanding debts against the District of Columbia after the $15,000,000 provided for by this bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, I did not mean to say anything of Nothing could be farther from anything Iintended to say

Mr. ALLISON. I misunderstood the Senator, then.
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. As I understand, all the liabilities thus ascertained, including bonds, certificates issued, claims audited and not carried into certificates, and claims supposed to exist, still fall some $150,000 or more short of the $15,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to recommit the report of the conference committee to the committee.

The question being put, there were on division—ayes 23, noes 23. Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christianey, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Gordon, Kernan, Logan, Morton, Spencer, and Thurman—15.

So the motion was agreed to.

JOHN M. DORSEY AND WILLIAM F. SHEPEARD.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 227; reported from the Committee on Claims by the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be taken up.

Mr. KELLY. I think we had better proceed with the bill in regard to the sale of timber lands which was under consideration yes-

Mr. WRIGHT. I will not antagonize this bill with my friend's measure at all; but it will only take about two minutes, I think. My friend from Nevada who is nearest me [Mr. Jones] is very anxious to have the bill disposed of, and the Senator's colleague, [Mr. MITCHELL,] who has been absent from the Chamber for some days on account of ill health, is now present, and I should be glad to have it taken up now

Mr. KELLY. Very well.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 27) for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William F. Shepeard. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $9,088 to John M. Dorsey and $3,780 to William Shepeard, in full settlement for beef and supplies furnished the troops by Wallace, Dorsey & Shepeard and by S. B. Wallace in quelling the Indian disturbances in the Territory of Utah, now the State of Nevada, in

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a printed report with the bill?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is.
Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear it read.
Mr. WRIGHT. If my friend will allow me one moment to make a statement of the circumstances of the case, perhaps it will not be

mr. CONKLING. I shall be glad to hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. WRIGHT. During the last Congress both Houses passed a bill paying Jordan & McPike for provisions furnished under precisely paying Jordan & McPike for provisions furnished under precisely the same circumstances that are set forth in the report accompanying this bill. A report was made at the last Congress, as I remember, (the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] can correct me if I am in error,) approving this same claim. I forget whether it passed the Senate or not, but at all events it was reported favorably by the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. It was not reached in the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT. It seems that, there being Indian disturbances in what was then Utah, now the State of Nevada, and the Government not being able to get its troops there and not having everything ready to suppress the disturbance, such Government officers as were there called upon the citizens to assist in quelling the disturbances, and the citizens did come to the aid of the Government officers. The persons who are named in this bill as well as Jordan & McPike, upon the request of the officers of the Government, furnished supplies to the recruits thus called to their aid. The bill has been acknowledged by the proper Department, but it was not passed for reasons which the Senator from Oregon will remember. I do not remember the particulars, but the correctness of it is not denied, as I understand, by any person. At the last Congress we passed a bill paying Jordan & McPike, and at the last Congress we also reported from our committee this bill favorably. The committee again unanimously reported it favorably at this session, so that I do not understand that there is any question as to the correctness of the bill at all. not being able to get its troops there and not having everything ready question as to the correctness of the bill at all.

Mr. CONKLING. After hearing the Senator's statement, I withdraw my request to hear the report read.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims, with amendments. The amendments were to insert the letter "F" between the words "William" and "Shepeard" in the eighth line; and to strike out the letter "B" in line 10 before "Wallace" and insert "S," so as to read "S. S. Wallace."

Mr. WRIGHT. These are mere formal amendments, so as to have the names correct.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William F. Shepeard."

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday

SALE OF TIMBER LANDS.

Mr. KELLY. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the bill under discussion yesterday relating to timber lands. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the considera-tion of the bill (S. No. 6) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in the Territories of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. McMillan to insert in section 2, line 20, after the word "himself:"

Nor has deponent executed any mortgage or other instrument upon said land or any part thereof by or under which, or any proceedings thereunder, the title may be vested in any other person.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I have been somewhat amused in listening to the debate which has taken place, not only on this particular bill, but on the bill which was presented a few days ago by the Senator from Kansas who sits farthest from me, [Mr. Harvey,] and the bill which was afterward presented by the Senator from Arkansas sitting before me, [Mr. Clayton,] which was passed the day before yesterday, as well as on the bill now pending before us, offered by the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. Kelly.] The subject of the mode and manner of disposing of the public domain has been considered for a great many years in the Congress of the United States as a most important subject; and this debate reminds us of the fact that history is great many years in the Congress of the United States as a most important subject; and this debate reminds us of the fact that history is all the time repeating itself, and that we are moving, generation after generation, very much in the same orbit and on the same plane; for, if you will recur back to the debates which took place in this body some forty-five years ago upon a series of resolutions introduced by a Senator from Connecticut, a gentleman by the name of Foot, you will be struck by the fact that the same ideas and the same views of public reliable to the same training the same views of public reliable to the same training the same views of public reliable to the same training the same views of public reliable to the same training the same views of public reliable to the view of the views of views of the views of the views of the views of lic policy which appear to animate a certain number of gentlemen on his floor now were then entertained by members of this body. A large number of gentlemen, mostly from the North, at that period were anxious to restrain the disposition of the public domain in the West; and hence Mr. Foot, in the session of 1829-'30 I believe, intro-West; and hence Mr. Foot, in the session of 1829-30 I believe, introduced a series of resolutions to stop the sales of the public lands in market at that day, to stop the surveys, and also to abolish the office of surveyor-general; and, further, that no public land should be sold westward until all the land lying eastward should have been disposed of. Furthermore, that the timber lands of the country should be held as public property, to be disposed of in limited quantities, fearing that the vast forests of the West would in a very short time be monopolized by speculators and soon destroyed; and providing also for the continuation of the law which was then in existence which prevented the sale of lands containing minerals, the minerals at that time being confined to lead and iron. confined to lead and iron.

It will be seen that the same feelings, the same ideas of public policy, then animated a portion of our public men as appear to be entertained by many members of this body at this day. It is a historical fact that the resolutions of Mr. Foot brought about a most exciting and learned and able debate. In the course of the discussion, the ordinance of 1787 was drawn in, and the question of the authorship of that ordinance was discussed between Mr. Webster and Mr. Benton, Mr. Webster asserting that Nathan Dane was the author of the anti-slavery clause in the ordinance of 1787, Mr. Benton controverting that and claiming that honor for Mr. Jefferson. The origin and construction of the Government were much discussed, and a remarkable, interesting, and able debate took place on the resolutions of able, interesting, and able debate took place on the resolutions of Mr. Foot. One of my predecessors, who was in his day an ornament in this body, the late David Barton, took an active part in that debate, and made two or three speeches unsurpassed in point of genuine ability and true eloquence. So did his colleague, the no less, and perhaps even more, distinguished Colonel Benton, who also took part. From that contest grew up the system which has existed without any change until very lately, by which it was provided that the public lands should be surveyed as speedily as possible and by proclamation of the President of the United States be placed in the market offered for sale to the highest hidder and if not they sald subket, offered for sale to the highest bidder, and if not then sold, subject to entry at private sale at the minimum price of a dollar and a quarter. That was the system which grew out of the discussion on the Foot resolution; and under that system an immense tide of emigration from 1830 up to the present day poured from the East to the valley of the Mississippi, and from Europe to that same rich valley that has given us the great population we have now.

Had it not been for the wise and statesman-like provision by which men were enabled to procure title to the rich lands of the West at a low price, this vast tide of emigration would not have taken place, and the great region of the West would to-day, to a great extent, be a wilderness instead of being as it is the home of many millions of inhabitants, while it was at that day the home of savages, and of a few French, settled in the old French towns built under the former colonial governments of France and Spain. By this enlightened policy, which enabled the industrious and enterprising laboring-man of the East enabled the industrious and enterprising laboring-man of the East and the industrious and enterprising laboring-man of Europe to acquire land in the West, this great tide of emigration was encouraged and poured in there and took up these lands. It was a wise, statesman-like policy.

That was, as I have already said, the policy which continued for many years and to some extent and in some States to this very day, and in my State, for instance, and in the States of Kansas and Nebraska and Iowa and Minnesota; and which, if the bill which has lately passed this body is passed in the other House, will also apply to all the Southern States. The effect has been, as I have already stated, most beneficial and most important.

stated, most beneficial and most important.

Now we are met by gentlemen on this floor with the argument that the great timber region of the West should be protected; that it is not only for the interest of the present generation but that we owe it to generations to come that this timber should be taken care of and should not be liable to be taken by monopolies and large corporations. I do not share in this view at all. I hold the argument to be not well founded. I look upon the vast timbered region of the West in a twofold light: first as a source of great wealth, as a source of great value in dollars and cents; but to make the timber valuable you have got to put it in the condition of lumber; the trees are to be cut, they are to be sawed and taken to market and disposed of. There I say more, that your forest will be better protected when owned by individuals than by the Government. Indeed, infinitely more forest has been destroyed by the fires which prevail in all unsettled counhas been destroyed by the fires which prevail in all unsettled countries than by the ax of the wood-chopper or the saw of the saw-mill. The amount of timber used is limited; the amount of timber destroyed is nearly without limit. As far as my own State is concerned the timber has been a great nuisance, and is in some portions of it to-day a positive injury. Hence, the prairies of Illinois and of your State, Mr. President, [Mr. Wright in the chair,] and of the State of Kansas, have invited population sooner and more rapidly than the lands of my own State because we have not such a vast extent of prairie country. The settlers on the new lands of my State tent of prairie country. The settlers on the new lands of my State do not pretend to use the timber; there is no adequate demand for it, as all persons acquainted with the West, and as the gentlemen who now sit before me, the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. Clayton,] and the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. HITCHCOCK,] well know. persons who settle upon the public lands of the West in a timbered country have only one way to get rid of it. It is not by cutting it down and making it into lumber. You have got to deaden the timber; you have got to circle the trees and destroy the circulation In that way immense districts of country are covered with dead trees, showing yet their majestic proportions in their naked grandeur. They have been circled and deadened because the timber could not be used; it could not be taken to market.

The question arises, was there a loss or a gain in thus disposing of that timber, in changing the condition of that country from what it was, a state not cultivated and covered with woods, into a state of high cultivation? Which was better for the public? Was there a gain? Was it not better that that vast quantity of timber should be destroyed and the local property of the state destroyed and the land plowed and cultivated than that a forest should be protected there for ages to come? Most assuredly it was better to troy those trees and make that land productive of food for man and feed for beasts than that it should remain encumbered with those vast forests.

Again, you cannot destroy the forests or the trees of the world. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Boutwell] a few days ago read us a letter, no doubt from a scientific gentleman, propounding a theory which may or may not be correct. Upon the idea embraced in that letter he offered an amendment to the bill then pending, (I believe the bill offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON] which afterward passed this body,) carrying out very much the same views that were expressed in the resolutions offered by Mr. Foot some forty-five years ago, restraining the disposition of the land and protecting the timber. I say that it is not wise to restrain the use of It is well to protect it from waste, from destruction by fire, from wanton destruction, but the use of timber ought not to be re-strained. It is only valuable when it has been changed from the condition of a tree to merchantable lumber, and before that time it is of no practical value. Timber is only used for fuel or for building purpose The use of wood is diminishing every day and with great Formerly it was employed for every purpose of building and it alone was the fuel used. At this day in a large and extensive section of the country it is not used for fuel at all, and the amount used for building purposes is growing less and less every day. For ship-building in a few years it will be entirely unnecessary; iron has taken the place of it. So it is not worth while for us to prevent the present generation from using timber and putting it to useful purposes, under Again, timber will reproduce itself. The timber of the present day, I have no doubt, is of modern growth all the world over. I know it is said, and I have read myself, that there are some trees standing yet around Jerusalem, perhaps on Mount Calvary itself—olive-trees—that were there when the Savior of the world trod the valleys and mountains of Judea. That may be true. We are told that some of the large pine-trees of California go back two and three thousand years. That may be true also. There may be a few trees there of that age, and there may be some few olive-trees standing in the plains and mountains of Judea that were there two thousand years ago; but as a fact the forest of the world is all new growth and is constantly being reproduced. The forest that is in Spain to-day, or in France, or in Germany, is not the forest that is in Spain to-day, or in France, or in Germany, is not the forest that was there when Cæsar was in Spain or in Gaul, or when Tacitus visited the shores of the Rhine. Surely not; it is a new forest, caused by being reproduced. The seminal principle is in the very bowels of the earth, and will produce itself so soon as the rays of the sun can strike it or have any effect upon that seminal principle. If you go upon the railroads of the West, where the new earth has been thrown up along embankments, you will see a new growth of timber unlike any growth in the neighyou will see a new growth of timber unlike any growth in the heighborhood. Mostly in your country, Mr. President, and mine, it is a dense growth of sycamore, where perhaps there was not before a single tree of this species. How did the sycamore come there? You cannot imagine that it was brought there by the seeds carried from a distance. It is believed by persons who have observed these things that the seminal principle of the sycamore was in the earth there, and had been there from the time it first came from the hands of its Maker. I believe that to be so. Therefore the forest reproduces itself, and each and every generation have the right to use just what it can for its own purposes. The amount is limited by the wants of each generation, and it leads to no destruction.

I presume that I shall vote for the bill of my friend from Oregon, because the Senators from that section of the country favor the bill; yet if I were a member from the Pacific coast I certainly would not favor the bill. I do not think it a wise bill; I do not think it in the interest of the Pacific coast that the bill should pass. If I were a member from the Pacific coast, I would insist upon the system that is now the law in my State and in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, by which the public lands are offered for sale and are sold at the minimum price of $1.25 to anybody; also subject to entry under the pre-emption law; and also subject to the homestead law; thus giving the largest and broadest facilities to invite emigration.

We of the West a few years ago needed population. We have a fair share of it now. They of the extreme West on the Pacific coast We of the West a few years ago needed population. We have a fair share of it now. They of the extreme West on the Pacific coast need that to-day which we needed some years ago—population; and the greatest inducement for population to go to a country is cheap and good lands, especially for this Anglo-Saxon race. Hold out to the emigrant of the East and of the Middle States and of Europe the fact that on the coast of the Pacific—in Oregon, Washington, and California—there are vast districts of fruitful land to be had at a dollar and a quarter, vast districts of large soil to be taken up by the premption or the homestead law and you give that invitation which emption or the homestead law, and you give that invitation which has always led the emigrant, "Come and take these lands," and they will come. They have come heretofore and they will come again. But as it is now a man cannot get any land in any of these States excepting as a pre-emptioner or a homesteader, which is very restricted.

The Senator from California remarked yesterday that he knew in his State of districts of land, owned by monopolists, so large that a person on horseback could hardly ride through the vast tract in one day. I will venture the assertion that no man in California has ever entered a million acres of land, or one hundred thousand acres of land, or twenty thousand acres of land, or ten thousand acres of land in a body; but the Senator is right in saying that there are tracts of are not entered lands; they are the old Mexican grants.

Mr. SARGENT. Will my friend allow me to say that the land was taken up in single bodies under the private-entry system—taken up in larger bodies than any Mexican grants in my State or in the State of Louisiana

Mr. BOGY. At a dollar and a quarter an acre?

Mr. SARGENT. Taken up with Sioux scrip and all sorts of scrip Mr. BOGY. The Sioux scrip to-day is worth double, treble, or quadruple what you can enter lands for, and always has been.

Mr. SARGENT. They had the privilege of paying the scrip or a dollar and a quarter, and they preferred using the scrip. Theventered with college scrip also.

Mr. BOGY. The college scrip is limited. A portion of that was andoubtedly taken to the State of California, but it seems to me that the amount cannot be large. Then again there is no speculation in acquiring large tracts of public land. It is a mistake to suppose so. The fact is, in the valley of the Mississippi, where the lands are rich and you might suppose it would have been a speculation to purchase lands, there has been no speculation in the acquisition of lands, and the few that tried it lost money by it. What an idea, that of speculating in lands in this country, which extends from the extremity of Florida to Alaska and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean! The quantity of land you have to enumerate in billions and millions of billions! Why, sir, there is no speculation, and there never will be in our day or in many, many generations to come. In certain locali-ties land will get to be of great value; but, as a great proposition to influence legislation, there is no speculation in land; and I will say more, that the sooner the speculator gets to California and to Oregon and Washington, the better. I believe there are a great many speculators there already. The sooner the wild lands of any country are bought by individuals, the better for that country. Lands in the condition of wild lands are of no value; they produce nothing and pay no taxes; but when changed from public lands to private prop-erty they are made to be productive to some extent; the forest is reduced to lumber, and made to yield a certain amount of money, and the lands pay taxes and contribute something to the revenue of the States. The sooner you get your lands in that condition the

I see no reason now why the landed system of my State should not exist in California or in Oregon or in Washington Territory. I see no reason why the mineral lands of California, and of Nevada, and of Utah should not be put into the public market for sale. I remember that in my State, when our mineral lands were held by the Government of the United States and by law could not be sold, and were not sold until the system which grew out of the debate on the Foot resolution made them salable, the mineral lands were held by the Federal Government and were leased from year to year, the Government getting a royalty, but no one could buy them. All lands which had been returned by the public surveyor as mineral lands were withheld from sale. It remained so for many years, and was a great misfortune, for the time being, to my State. So was the law in Wisconsin, and that the time being, to my State. So was the law in Wisconsin, and that within my recollection. It is not the rule now as regards the mineral lands of my State containing lead or iron, or, indeed, any other minerals, but it is presumed to have none other. But the mineral lands of the new States and Territories, Colorado, Utah, Nevada, and California, are not subject now to sale, excepting under very peculiar conditions and in very small quantities. Is say it is a misfortune. It would be better for the Government, better for the country, better for the world, if they were all owned by private individuals. They are reserved to a great extent. I have not the time or disposition to go into the details; but they are hard of acquisition. The people can only get them under certain conditions amounting nearly to a denial: and get them under certain conditions amounting nearly to a denial; and the effect is that the Government remains as the great proprietor of the vast mineral lands of the new Territories where silver and gold are found. It is a misfortune. It checks the production of the precious metals. It checks enterprise. The precious metals away down in the bowels of the earth are of no real value. The only value is that you know they are there, but the labor of man has got to get them from that position. It would be a great deal better if all these lands were put into the market to-morrow and sold. Let the Government realize even a dollar and a quarter an acre for them; let them go into the hands of private owners, and then men would be stimulated to invest their capital and to apply their industry and their ingenuity to the production of the precious metals.

I have often admired the land system under which the lands of my State since 1830 have been disposed of; and so in the State of Iowa, the State of Illinois, the State of Nebraska, the State of Kansas, and the State of Arkansas. That system I think should be carried to the State of the Pacific without our restriction without our effort of the Pacific without our restriction without our effort of the Pacific without our restriction without our effort of the Pacific without our restriction without our effort of the Pacific without our restriction without our effort of the Pacific without our restriction without our effort of the Pacific without our restriction without our effort of the Pacific without our restriction without our effort of the Pacific without our restriction without our effort of the Pacific without our restriction without our effort of the Pacific without our restriction without our effort of the Pacific without our restriction with restriction without our restriction without our restriction without restriction without restriction with restriction with restriction without restriction with restriction w States of the Pacific without any restriction, without any effort at taking care of the timber. The timber will take care of itself, except that which is wanted, and the sooner it is wanted the better. It is a source of great wealth to-day that Wisconsin and Minnesota have these vast pineries, and the sooner they are reduced the better.

I think it will be better for the friends of this bill to have it recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, and for them to present to the Senate a new bill, or, in other words, to require the Land sent to the senate a new bill, or, in other words, to require the Land Department to execute the law which is now really in force but remains unexecuted; that is, carry on the public surveys on the Pacific coast as soon as possible, and when the surveys are returned to the Land Office here, put the lands into market under the proclamation of the President as soon as possible, and let those lands afterward be subject to entry at a dollar and a quarter an acre—all kinds of land, mineral land, timber land, farming land, and other land not farming. That system I consider would be beneficial to that section of country. It proved beneficial to my section, and I cannot see why it should not to that section.

I have never heard of a good reason why timber should be protected. I listened to the eloquent speech of my friend from Kansas [Mr. In-Instend to the eloquent speech of my friend from Kansas [Mr. In-Galls] in behalf of timber a few days ago, but I did not appreciate his argument and do not think it is correct. The sooner timber can be converted into lumber, I say, the better. Let every generation use as much of it as they can. Its value consists in its being cut up as soon as possible and taken to the markets of the world. Let the vast pines of California and of Oregon be changed from standing pines in the forest to lumber, and let that lumber be taken across the Pacific Ocean to Chipse to Lunch to Carlon and to all the inless of the America. to China, to Japan, to Ceylon, and to all the isles of the Archipelago, and let them send back the teas and spices of those countries in exchange for that timber, and it will be much better for the people of the Pacific coast than to maintain that timber standing in the forest. In time, when that timber is all taken away, a new growth will spring up, supplying the wants of each generation. As each generation appears upon the face of the earth there is a constant supply, as regular as the water itself.

I presume, sir, that under the circumstances I am bound to vote for this bill, and yet I do not approve of it. I vote for it because it appears to be the wish of the Senators from that section of the country. Yet if I were a Senator from that section, permit me to say, I would advocate no such bill. I would make an effort, and I think the effort would be successful, to carry to that country the same law that has existed for years in the valley of the Mississippi under which all our vast public domain was disposed of, and which invited and brought there that immense population which is destined soon to rule the pol-there that immense population which is destined soon to rule the politics of this country.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I do not see how the Senate can, consistently with its action the day before yesterday, make the lands covered by this bill the subject of private entry without first offering them to the competition of public sale. The day before yesterday we passed a bill which required lands that had heretofore been controlled for public sale to be again offered for public sale before they offered for public sale to be again offered for public sale before they could be made subject to private entry. This bill proposes that lands which never have been offered at public sale shall now be made subject to private entry. I cannot see how we can do that consistently with our former action.

A great deal has been said here against offering public lands at public sale; about the idea of combinations defeating a just competition at those sales. I think that that objection does not apply to this class of lands. It is true that there have been many instances where the intention of the Government in offering public lands at public sale has to a certain extent been defeated by the action of persons com-bining to prevent a fair competition at those sales; but you will find that in those cases the lands were those upon which persons had gone and settled before the sales took place; lands upon which they had built themselves homes; and it was but natural for them, when persons came to buy their homes, to combine to prevent that thing from being done. But in this case these lands are not subject to settlement as I understand; they are lands that are unfit for agricultural purposes, and are only valuable for their timber. Hence, the same inducements which would apply in the former case to combinations being made to prevent a fair competition at public sales would not to dispose of these lands, is to first offer them at public sales would not exist in this case. I think the best thing that can be done, if we are to dispose of these lands, is to first offer them at public sale so that every person can come in and compete for them. After that has been done, then let them be offered at private sale, so that individuals may come in and buy them at the minimum price.

At the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Ingalls] I think I shall move to strike out the words "and which have not been offered at public sale according to law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) There is an amendment now pending to the bill. Is this an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir. I will wait until that amendment is disposed of. I do not know, however, whether the amendment I suggest would comply with the wishes of the introducer of this bill; for it seems to have become the policy of the Government of late not to offer public lands for sale at all. While the law authorizes them to be offered at public sale, it seems that the President and the officers having in a large the putting of lands into president and the officers having in a large the putting of lands into president and the officers having in large the putting of lands into president and the officers having in the putting in cers having in charge the putting of lands into market have observed a different policy. I think the latter is a mistaken policy. I think these timber lands should be offered at public sale. I can see no reason why they should not be offered at public sale. I can see no reason why they should not be offered at public sale. I fully agree with what has been said by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Bogv.] I believe it is a great deal better for individuals to own lands of this character than for the Government to own them. The Government becomes the monopolizer in this case. I think that it would be a becomes the monopolizer in this case. I think that it would be a great deal better to have them in the hands of individuals so that the States may tax them, and so that where persons want to use them for some good purpose they may be allowed to do so. I will not, however, press my amendment now, but wait until the vote is taken on the amendment already pending; and if, on looking over the bill further, I think it necessary to move the amendment I have spoken of, I will do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.]

Mr. OGLESBY. Let the amendment be read.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported. The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is in section 2, line 20, after the word "himself" to insert:

Nor has deponent executed any mortgage or other instrument upon said land or any part thereof by or under which, or any proceedings thereunder, the title may be vested in any other person.

So as to make the clause read:

And that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person or persons whatsoever, by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure, in whole or in part, to the benefit of any person except himself; nor has deponent executed any mortgage or other instrument upon said land or any part thereof by or under which, or any proceedings thereunder, the title may be vested in any other person, which statement must be verified by the oath of the applicant, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. After the words "United States," in line 19 of section 2, I move to insert:

Or any right in said land or the timber thereon.

So that it will read:

And that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person or persons whatsoever, by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States, or any right in said land or the timber thereon, should inure, in whole or in part, to the benefit of any person except himself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to say only a word or two. The criticism was made the last day this bill was under consideration by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Sherman,] that under the bill a person could make a pre-contract for stripping it of timber, or for any interest in the land short of the absolute title. On examining the bill carefully to see if that was so, I came to the conclusion that he possibly was right. I wish to exclude any such conclusion, and for that reason I have offered this amendment, and that is its only effect, as I understand.

Mr. President, while having a very high opinion of the wisdom of my friend from Missouri, [Mr. Bogy,] I do not think it is for the benefit of my State that the lands of the State should go in large quantities into the hands of a few individuals. We have been troubled that way a great deal. Land is held for speculative purposes, and settlers who go for lands can only acquire them by paying very much more than the Government price. It would be an excellent thing for my State to-day if all its broad acres, both those covered by the Spanish grants and those taken up under the system of private entry. ish grants and those taken up under the system of private entry, could be mere Government lands, open to the settler for one dollar and a quarter or two dollars and a half an acre. Unfortunately that is not the case.

My friend says we have millions of acres there. That is very true; My friend says we have millions of acres there. That is very true; but the lands which were fanned by the sea-breezes were taken up by the Spaniards in old times under Mexican grants. They absorbed enormous quantities. In the progress of time, when Americans went there, they found this condition of things, and the only lands available were in the fertile valleys beyond. The attention of the State was given very largely to mining; its agricultural capacities were not understood. Such lands as those in the San Joaquin and Tulare Valleys, which were then open for settlement, were not sought by settlers because no one understood their capacity. They were absorbed in other and more profitable branches of business at that time. The United States organized its system of surveys over the State of California and the early surveyors-general went on, under the liberal appropriations which were made, to survey these vast tracts of land, these great broad valleys lying open to the sun, which should have been the home of thousands and thousands of families thereafter—were so designed by God and nature. Still settlers did not not take up these lands under the pre-emption law, the homestead law not at that time existing, but they remained undisposed of. Under the policy which existed twenty-years ago these lands were offered, as it is called; but though they were offered, no one bought them at auction. Then under the policy of the law they became open to private entry, and an der the policy of the law they became open to private entry, and an individual could buy any quantity he saw fit for a dollar and a quarter an acre, and by several laws he could apply agricultural scrip, Sioux scrip, Chippewa scrip, and various other forms of Government paper in paying for these lands. The result was that as men began to find that California was a fine agricultural State, that these broad valleys especially with the help of a little irrigation would yield very largely of cereals, speculators turned their attention to them, and they always move more rapidly than the settlers, and they have acquired these tracts in enormous quantities and hold them in these great quantities to-day, and if a settler goes there he has to pay an enormous price.

Our timber lands were not surveyed at that time and are not largely surveyed at the present time, and this bill only applies to surveyed lands. Consequently the speculator never has been able to get hold of them. I would myself much rather that the United States should hold them to the crack of doem than that they should go into the hands of great land speculators who might go to my State, to be doled out to the people who may need them now and in the future. I would much rather that the present destructive system, than that this more destructive system, as I conceive, should be applied; and I have seen the operation of both systems in my own State.

By this bill, by every honest guard we may put upon it, we prevent speculators getting hold of these lands, and at the same time supply a great public necessity, make an honest business of the pursuit of lumbering. We allow the acquisition of this land, and the taking of this timber in such quantities as may be necessary. We believe we secure an incidental advantage to that which was named by the eloquent Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] yesterday, that by their going in small quantities into the hands of purchasers they will be better guarded, and that men will have an interest then to see that sweeping fires do not run over them, and thus these great treasures will be preserved for the future. Unfortunately these pine forests, when they burn down, do not grow up, like Jonah's gourd, in a night; they do not grow up in a year or ten years. They take sometimes a generation; sometimes it takes one hundred years. I can show my friend from Missouri trees upon the Sierras of California that unquestionably, by any judgment which we can form from their appearance, ay, from the concentric circles within their bark, are three or four thousand years old. The ordinary pine-tree of the forest there is one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five years.

Mr. BOGY. I will say to my friend from California that the forests on this side of the mountains will regrow in about twenty years. Men who chop wood in Pennsylvania and in Missouri for coaling purposes will in twenty years go back on the same land and chop new wood for coaling, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] can testify. In twenty or twenty-five years there will be a regrowth, which is a very short time when you speak of legislation for a coun-

Mr. SARGENT. I was not talking about chaparral, or wood that can be turned into the coal pit to make charcoal. I am talking of forest trees. I know that in twenty years a pine tree may grow to be nearly the size of the Senator's body, or probably two-thirds that size, provided the soil is favorable. The trees which we are accustomed to on the Sierras, when cut down into timber, require two large saws to cut through them, one above the other, and then there will be a space between the saws which the teeth do not cut.

Mr. BOGY. The sooner they are converted into greenbacks, the better for California.

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; it is a grand deposit, like the coal-fields. Suppose you could take all the coal which underlies the soil in the United States and sell it to China for anything they could return, what would there be for the future ?

Mr. BOGY. The wisdom of man will provide something else.
Mr. SARGENT. The wisdom of man will preserve that which he has, and not trust to a vain confidence that Providence will supply his improvidence.

Mr. BOGY. What will be done in ten thousand years to come?
Mr. SARGENT. The Senator wants to know what may be done in ten thousand years. I cannot speculate on what may happen in that length of time; I doubt if either of us will be here to see it; but I do care as to what may happen twenty years from now to my children or my children's children, or those of my constituents.

I am glad to hear my friend say that he will vote for the bill because he believes that we earnestly and sincerely advocate its passage and suppose we are right. I appreciate that kindness on his part. do not know how the system he advocates may have worked in the State of Missouri, how dense the forest may be there or how sparse. It may be that under the conditions existing in his State the system with which he is satisfied may have worked very well. That I do not question; but I do say from years of experience in my own State, from nearly thirty years' residence in these very mountains to which I refer, that I do know the wants of my people and know the peculiarities of these forests. I desire to prevent speculators getting hold of them, while at the same time I want to make them available for my constituents, and in the line of that remark is the amendment which I propose.

Mr. BOGY. Let me ask a question. On line 12 of the first page it is provided:

And in all other Territories of the United States, not exceeding forty acres to

Do you contemplate that no one person shall be able to secure more than forty acres of this land in the Territories of the United States?

Mr. SARGENT. I suggested to the committee on the first day this Mr. SARGENI. I suggested to the committee on the first day this bill was under discussion, on my attention being called to it by my friend from Kansas, that that clause had better be stricken out. I am not on the committee that reported the bill, but I think that is too small an amount. In fact, following my own judgment, I would make the amount in all cases three hundred and twenty instead of one hundred and sixty acres; but I do not wish to antagonize the committee.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, I stated yesterday that the reason why the committee concluded to limit the amount to be taken by any person in the Territories to forty acres was on account of the scarcity of timber in all the Territories except Washington. If the honorable Senator from Missouri would cross the plains, he would see that from the Missouri River

Mr. BOGY. I have crossed the plains.

Mr. KELLY. Then the Senator will remember that in crossing over from the western boundary of Nebraska to the Sierra Nevada he did not see as many pine-trees standing in sight of the road as there were miles between those two boundaries. I presume he would not find two thousand trees fit for timber along fifteen hundred miles of the distance. All the Territories of the United States, except Washington, are embraced in that part of the public domain lying west of Nebraska and east of the Sierra Nevada. In that sparsely-timbered portion of the country, if any person be allowed to take one hundred and sixty acres, what can any other person take when one will exhaust it all? That would give a monopoly to the one who would locate the first one hundred and sixty acres, leaving nothing for any other occupant; and for that reason the Delegates from the Territories were opposed to any one individual or any corporation having more than forty acres, so as to destroy all monopoly in the timbered lands.

Mr. BOGY. How can a man run a saw-mill with only forty acres of ground to supply it? Do you not require lumber in your country for building houses? How can a man supply a saw-mill with only forty acres of timbered lands?

Mr. KELLY. There are the same for a saw-mill with only forty acres of timbered lands?

Mr. KELLY. There are very few saw-mills in the Territories of the United States, excepting in Washington, for the reason that there is but little lumber there. It is true there are saw-mills perhaps remote from the railway in places where I have not seen the timber. In the mouths of gorges they may have some; but it is a fact that all the Territories will have to be supplied mainly from the Sierra Nevada and the Cascade range of mountains. They must take it thousands of miles by railway. They have not the timber there. They have sufficient perhaps to make rails for fences for their gardens and to creet their habitations, but aside from that there is no timber. Now, in the Pacific States there is an abundance of it. There is the place in the Pacific States there is an abundance of it. There is the place where you can manfacture it, and from there it will be taken eastward as soon as railroad communication between the different parts of the country is established. Perhaps one reason why these Territories are so slowly populated is that they have no timber there. Would it be right and proper to give any one individual who might first go there the right to select one hundred and sixty acres of timber land which might include the only timber within twenty or thirty or forty miles? As I said, the Delegates from the Territories were consulted, and they themselves expressed a preference for this limitation, and that is the reason why it was inserted.

Mr. (NGALLS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at three o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 17, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., and was called to order by The Clerk, who said: The Speaker of the House being absent by leave of the House, the Clerk, in conformity with the precedents and usages of the House, asks that the House be in order while the Chaplain leads in prayer.

After prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.,

The CLERK said: The House is now in session; and if there be no objection, the Clerk will bold that the first business in order is the election of a Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That Hon. Samuel S. Cox, a Representative from the State of New York, be, and is hereby, appointed Speaker pro tempore during the present temporary absence of the Speaker.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Clerk, I move to substitute the name of Hon.

JOSEPH C. S BLACKBURN, of Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Clerk, tendering my sincere acknowledgments to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] for this evidence of his partiality, I feel constrained to say that, appreciating as I do my own want of experience as presiding officer of a great deliberative body, and contrasting that with the extended services and the eminent fitness of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] whose name is already in the body of the resolution, I feel that I cannot do less in justice to myself or in justice to the House than to ask the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his amendment and let the resolution pass in its original form.

Mr. CLYMER. That being the desire of the gentleman from Kentucky, I ask the privilege of withdrawing my amendment.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. COX (on taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore) said: Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, the occasion which calls for a Speaker pro tempore is under the circumstances no subject of congratulation. While this mark of confidence deserves the warmest acknowledgment, it is the overruling wish of my heart that the temporary occupancy of this chair may be brief and that our respected Speaker may soon return to it re-invigorated. It is one of the felicities of our system of government that, come sickness or health, life or death, to public servants, the processes of administration and legislation cannot be retarded. Let us proceed to our business in that spirit of friendly and dutiful rivalry to which I shall endeavor to contribute.

The first business in order is the reading of the Journal of yesterday.

The Journal was read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to raise the question, in order to have it authoritatively settled by the House, whether the Speaker pro tempore ought not to take the oath of office before proceeding to the execution of the duties of his office. There have been but few occasions since the organization of Congress, almost a century ago, when it has been found necessary to elect a Speaker pro tempore. Under our rules the Speaker may call any member of the pro tempore. Under our rules the Speaker may call any member of the House to the chair to preside during the day; but it is not understood that such assignment invests him with all the powers of the Speaker; certainly not with the right to sign bills, but merely to preside. The election of a Speaker pro tempore, as in the present case, for a week, possibly longer, may involve very serious questions as to the validity of our laws. Doubtless the present occupant of the chair will be called apon to sign important bills, and if any question should arise as to the validity of those laws on the ground that the gentleman acting as Speaker had taken no oath of office previous to entering noon his duties, it might lead to serious results. upon his duties, it might lead to serious results.

I have not myself looked over the precedents, as I doubt not some other members of the House have done; but within my own term of service here I believe there has been but one case of this kind. In that case the temporary presiding officer served only for a single day, the last day of the session; and indeed I believe in that case the Speaker resigned absolutely, so that there was an election of a Speaker, not of a Speaker pro tempore.

But precedents, in our early history, are not very important in view of the fact that a recent statute seems to decide the question. I do not quite see how we can avoid the force of the act of July 2, 1862, which requires that-

Every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments or the public service, excepting the President of the United States, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary of other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation, &c.

Now, it may be said that the present occupant of the chair has subscribed to that very oath on taking his seat as a member of Congress. He has, indeed, subscribed to the words of that oath; but those words related to the office that he then entered upon, (if the position as a member of the House may be called an office,) but did not relate to the duties of the office of Speaker of the House. The present occupant of the chair is about proceeding to execute the duties of a very high and important office, to him entirely new, an office and to the duties he has taken no oath of faithfulnes

It seems to me, therefore, that even if the precedents are not clear, we shall avoid all possible difficulties hereafter by requiring the Speaker pro tempore to take the usual oath of office before proceeding speaker pro tempore to take the usual oath of office before proceeding to perform the duties of the position. Therefore, in order to bring this question to a settlement, I move that the oath of office be now administered to the Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, this is a question for the House to determine. It will be sufficient for me to show what has been done under similar circumstances. After a pretty thorough search, we find that on April 20, 1798, the proceedings which I will ask the Clerk to read took place in this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

FRIDAY, April 20.

It being announced by the Clerk that the Speaker was sick and unable to attend

It being announced by the Clerk that the Speaker was sick and unable to access the House,
Mr. Sprague moved that a Speaker pro tempore be appointed. After some observations on the propriety of so doing, the motion was put and carried; there being 46 votes for it.
The Sergeant-at-Arms accordingly proceeded to collect the ballots; which being done, Messrs. Josiah Parker and Morris were called upon to count the votes, which Mr. Parker reported to be as follows, viz: For Mr. Dent, 40; Mr. Sitgreaves, 19;
Mr. Baldwin, 12; Mr. J. Williams, 1; and Mr. Blount, 1.
Mr. Denr was accordingly declared to be elected; and, having been conducted to the chair by Mr. Sitgreaves, he addressed the House, as follows:
GENTLEMEN: In the execution of the duties of this temporary appointment, my endeavor will be to evince strict impartiality. Permit me to hope your co-operation in maintaining order, and to expect your support in all cases of official decisions where it ought to be afforded.

Mr. RANDALL. It will be observed by the House that in the case

Mr. RANDALL. It will be observed by the House that in the case just read the Speaker pro tempore took no additional oath for the then temporary occupancy of the chair. There is no doubt he signed bills and discharged other duties pertaining to his office.

Now, further on in the same book will be found a similar case under the order of Novelan May 28.

der date of Monday, May 28.

Mr. FORT. In what year?

Mr. RANDALL. In the same year, May 28, 1798. I ask the Clerk

The Clerk read as follows:

The Userk read as follows:

The usual hour of proceeding to business having arrived, the Clerk informed the members present that he had just heard that the Speaker was so much indisposed as not to be able to attend the House this morning.

Mr. D. Foster moved that the House proceed to the choice of a Speaker protempore, which motion was carried; the ballots were collected; and Messrs. Baldwin and Rutledge being called to tell the votes it appeared that Mr. Dent had fifty-one votes, which being a very large majority of the members present (indeed all except two or three scattering votes to four or five other members) he was accordingly declared to be elected, and conducted to the chair accordingly.

Mr. RANDALL. A further instance took place on the 20th of June, 1848, which is more striking because of the facts and opinions drawn out in the debate. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Burt, before taking the chair, from the Clerk's desk, suggested whether it was not necessary that he should be sworn before entering upon the discharge of the duties of the temporary office to which he had been elected. He was sworn as a member of this House at the commencement of the session to support the Constitution, but he had taken no oath to discharge the additional duties of Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. Cobb would inquire whether there was any oath but that to support the Con-

Mr. Burr. That is the oath taken by the Speaker.

Mr. Cobb suggested, as that oath had been taken by the gentleman from South Carolina as a member of this House, no further oath was necessary now.

Mr. ASHMUND said he did not understand that at the commencement of a session the Speaker was sworn as such, but simply as a member of the House.

Mr. Sims. He is sworn first; that is all.

Mr. Burr requested the Clerk to read that portion of the first day's Journal which recorded the fact.

The Clerk read accordingly.

It was recorded that Mr. Adams administered the oath to support the Constitution to the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, the Speaker, and that the Speaker administered the same oath to the other members of the House.

Mr. Burr, with this explanation, was satisfied, and then took the chair.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Speaker, the oath which is taken by the Speaker of this House, when elected, in no respect differs from the oath taken by a member of the House. As was stated in the debate just read, "he is sworn first; that is all." Members took the oath to support the Constitution in the office upon which they were about to

It is for the House to determine the question of course, but I would suggest whether, in case the Speaker pro tempore is now sworn, we should not be put in the condition of having two Speakers, as it were. All the cases I have examined, as will be seen by what has been read by the Clerk from the records, go to show that there is no necessity for the administration of any additional oath to the Speaker pro tempore. In the brief time allowed me, I have been able to find no instance where

In the brief time allowed me, I have been able to find no instance where an additional oath has been required or taken by the Speaker pro tempore. As I have already stated, the oath taken by the member of the House and by the Speaker is identical.

Mr. KASSON. Has the gen leman from Pernsylvania examined the form of the oath so as to answer whether any change of law is required by the act of 1862 which we find in the Revised Statutes? It seems to me the point of his explanation is defective in this. There are two officers in this House which may be held by any member of the House. One, the legislative office of a member upon the floor, and the other that of Speaker, who has largely added duties to those which pertain to him as a member of this House. In the discharge of these added duties, such as signing bills, correcting the Journal, which no other member can possibly do, preserving order, enforcing the rules impartially, and a great many duties are imposed upon the Speaker as such, which the House protects itself under the law, in order to secure the administration of them, by requiring an oath of that member who discharges those particular duties. Now the point which it seems to me the gentleman does not quite meet is that the oath proposed now-by the gentleman from Ohio is to be administered to a new officer of the House who has been unsworn hitherto in this seems to me the point of his explanation is defective in this. to a new officer of the House who has been unsworn hitherto in this

Mr. RANDALL. I have had but little time to look up authorities, and perhaps the gentleman can correct me. I found no instance, how ever, where a Speaker pro tempore was required to take an additional oath. Now, can the gentleman from Iowa cite a single instance where a Speaker pro tempore was sworn upon election to the temporary occu-pancy of the chair?

Mr. KASSON. I can only say the Journals, so far as I have seen, are silent except in the last instance named.

Mr. RANDALL. Ah, in that case there was an absolute vacancy of the Speaker's chair, and Mr. Pomeroy was elected, not Speaker pro the Speaker s that, and Mr. Folheroy was elected, not speaker protempore, but Speaker of the House.

Mr. KASSON. Very true; but the point I make is whether, the Speaker pro tempore with all the powers of the Speaker where the official duty is the same, the law does not require an oath to secure a proper administration of the office.

Mr. RANDALL. The oath taken by the Speaker is identical with that taken by all the other members of the House.

Mr. KASSON. But the Speaker took it in the chair and not upon the floor, and though identical, he took it to discharge his duties as Speaker.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Kentucky, before he proceeds, allow me to say a word in reply to the points made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky has the

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. It strikes meit is necessary for the Speaker pro tempore, elected by the House, who has just assumed the duties of the Chair, to take an oath. Since this discussion has arisen I have looked at the Digest on the subject, and I see on page 212, which relates to the Speaker, that he is "required to take an additional oath."

Now, the Speaker of this House is of course an officer of this House and is sworn just as any other officer of the House. Members of Congress are sworn to support the Constitution, &c., and to discharge the duties of the office on which they are about to enter. Now, the Speaker discharges different duties from those of members of Congress. He anters on a different office—a special office—and the highest office in

Therefore, it seems to me, although there is no special oath provided for the Speaker, yet when a member is taken from the floor to discharge the duties of Speaker he is required to take an additional oath "to discharge the duties of the office upon which he is about to enter." I think that was fairly the intention. A gentleman beside me suggests that there is no difference between the oath administered to the Speaker and that administered to the member. True. But when a member assumes the duties of the chair, he is "required to take an additional oath," or, in other words, an oath to discharge the duties of the office on which he is about to enter, which are different from those of members in general. It seems clear, Mr. Speaker, that it was the intention of the makers of this Digest that the Speaker elected on an occasion like this should take an additional oath, or rather the same oath, but from a different stand-point, as he assumes different duties.

Mr. KNOTT. Suppose the Speaker pro tempore takes no additional oath, will that omission affect in any way the validity of any act he may perform as an officer de facto?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I do not know that it would. I do not know that it is necessary that the occupant of the chair now should take an additional oath; but it seems to me that such was intended by the authors of the parliamentary law under which we act; and I again call the attention of members of the House to page 212 of the Digest, where, under the head "Speaker" it is stated—

He is required to take an additional oath.

Then it says "see oath." But under the title "Oath" I find no special Then it says "see oath." But under the title "Oath" I find no special oath for the Speaker. But there is this general distinction, which-I repeat, that we are all sworn to discharge the duties of the office upon which we are about to enter. But the oath administered to the Clerk and to other officers of the House is not the same as the oath administered to members of Congress, because the Clerk is about to enter on the special duties of his office, as are the others; and so the Speaker enters on new duties, and, it seems to me, he is required to take an additional oath. I should suggest, at any rate, to save the question and avoid all possibility of mistake, that the Speaker protempore be required to take the oath.

Mr. GARFIELD. This discussion, in my judgment, is exceedingly important, and of course there is not a possible touch of partisanship in it. We are all as one in our desire to do just what is right in this

I have been very much interested in the argument of the gentle-man from Kentucky, [Mr. Jones, ] and fully concur with him. I want to say a word in reply to the suggestions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] It appears that, of the precedents he has referred to, all save one occurred prior to the act of 1862. Even in one of those, prior to the act of 1862, the question was raised and there was some doubt about it, and they made it a matter of record, in the proper place, that the person taking the chair had taken an oath in the form of the ordinary oath administered to members.

But, although the precedents he cites, one of them being a mere omission to take the oath, showing the question was not raised, omission to take the oath, showing the question was not raised, throw some doubt upon the early practice, yet I make this point, that the law of 1862 is peremptory and overrules all previous practice. In the law of 1862 the language is sweeping and universal as to every person entering upon any office under the United States, excepting the President. He alone is excepted, because the Constitution prescribes a peculiar oath for him, different from that prescribed for other officers. Now, I hold that the law of 1862 leaves us no discretion. It is positive, clear, and peremptory in its language, that any nerson entering upon any office, civil, military, or naval, under any person entering upon any office, civil, military, or naval, under the United States, except the President, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, take the oath therein prescribed.

Now how can we evade it? My friend from Pennsylvania has referred to the case of Mr. Pomeroy, elected as Speaker of this House on the last day of the session. I have the Journal before me. He took the oath. Why? Some might have said he had already taken took the oath. Why? Some might have said he had already taken the oath, the very same oath, in the very same words, when he was sworn in as a member of the House which on the last day of its session elected him Speaker. They might have said "You do not need to take it over again; you have already taken it in this form and in this House." But they were then acting under the law of 1862, and therefore very properly the House said, We have elected a new Speaker, and, although he has to serve for only one day, yet for that day, under this law of 1862, the oath must be administered to him; he has been sworn as a member of the House in the very same words, but when he enters upon this new office, he must take the oath prebut, when he enters upon this new office, he must take the oath prescribed by law for that office. And although the words of the oath for Speaker and member are identical, yet the office he entered upon was a different one, and hence the eath itself is a new and different oath. in its force and effect.

Now, the present occupant of the chair holds a place from which he may be called to the presidency within one week under the Con-stitution of the United States. Vacancies may so occur that we shall salute him as the Executive of the United States before the expiration of the term to which we have just elected him; and it is a serious business for us to say that, while in one other case we have elected a Speaker for a day only and administered the oath to him for that day, we will now elect a Speaker for a week, possibly for the remainder of the term, and administer to him no oath of office whatever.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will observe that appointments by the Speaker of Speakers pro tempore have constantly been made, but they are made under the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. Ah; when the Speaker calls a man to the chair, he is merely a locum tenens; he presides, but he never signs a bill.

He is not elected by the House.

Mr. RANDALL. In that case the Speaker pro tempore under the rules can only be appointed for one day.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will observe that in such cases the member called to the chair for the day only never signed bills. Mr. RANDALL. Now, I will ask to have read section 1756 of the Revised Statutes which has been referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit, either in the civil, military, or naval service, excepting the President and the persons embraced by the section following, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any part of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath: "I. A. B. do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought, nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever, under any authority, or pretended authority, in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear (or affirm) that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any metal reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter: So help me God.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that the Speaker

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that the Speaker pro tempore in no instance partakes of the salary or emoluments of

I yield now to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Tucker.]
Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] allow me to ask him a question?
Mr. RANDALL. I have yielded the floor to the gentleman from

Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.]
Mr. REAGAN. What right has the gentleman from Pennsylvania to farm out the floor on this occasion?

Mr. RANDALL. I am not farming it out at all; I want the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] to state a single point about the oath taken in the Senate, and then the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] can take the floor in his own right.

Mr. TUCKER. It occurred to me, Mr. Speaker, that we might gain some light on this question by knowing what the precedents in the Senate of the United States were, for you will observe that under the Constitution of the United States the President pro tempore of the Senate is a constitutional officer; the Speaker pro tempore is not a constitutional officer. The only presiding officer of the House by the Constitution is a Speaker. The presiding officer of the Senate is the Vice-President, and in the absence of the Vice-President the Constitution provides that the Senate shall choose their other officer and elect a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

Now, if the President pro tempore of the Senate is not required to take an oath of office, a fortiori a Speaker pro tempore, who is not a constitutional officer, would not be required, I presume, to take it. I went over to the Senate and found that the precedent there is that went over to the Senate and found that the precedent there is that the President pro tempore never does take the oath of office. The Vice-President of course does; but the President pro tempore does not take an additional oath. Now, I apprehend then that the matter stands just thus: The Speaker of this House is still Speaker, notwithstanding the occupancy of the chair by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] as Speaker pro tempore. He is appointed merely to preside in the absence of the officer.

Mr. GARFIELD. To preside only?
Mr. TUCKER. To preside over the House.
Mr. GARFIELD. What about his signing bills?
Mr. TUCKER. He may do some things else, but he presides over

Mr. GARFIELD. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question

Mr. GARFIELD. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question to elucidate his argument?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. While the Speaker is absent have we not just said by resolution that the person now occupying the chair is our Speaker, and the words pro tempore mean nothing more than a limitation of his term of office; but within the limitation of his term of office is he not as perfectly and fully and absolutely Speaker as our Speaker who was here vesterday?

Mr. TUCKER. He exercises all the functions of the office of Speaker, but he is not Speaker.

Mr. GARFIELD. Ah! but did not the resolution say that he was elected Speaker †

Mr. TUCKER. No, sir; Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. GARFIELD. The words pro tempore are a mere limitation upon his term of office. Our Speaker [Mr. KERR] is Speaker pro tempore for two years, and the present occupant of the Chair is Speaker pro tempore for 't may be a week and perhaps longer.

Mr. TUCKER. I apprehend that the case is just this: Mr. Cox might be called to the chair by the Speaker, and, while occupying might be called to the chair by the Speaker, and, while occupying it as Speaker, he would perform all the functions of Speaker.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. TUCKER. If a committee is to be appointed he appoints that committee, and so with other duties pertaining to the office. Therefore there is a responsibility devolving upon him as Speaker pro tempore, but he does not take any additional oath in that case. The question is whether the additional functions which he is called upon to perform while Speaker pro tempore require that they should be done under the solemnity of an oath.

I apprehend that the best mode in which we can decide that ques-I apprehend that the best mode in which we can decide that question is to adhere to the precedents, and I understand the precedents are uniform in this House that no Speaker pro tempore has ever been called upon to take an oath of office. The precedents in the Senate are the same, and a fortiori that should be regarded as confirming the precedents of this House. There can be no great importance connected with this matter, and I suggest it will be a loss of time to discuss it forther. cuss it farther.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Colonel Fred. Grant, his Private Secretary, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) authorizing G. Harris Heap, United States consul at Tunis, to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis;

An act (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence; and An act (H. R. No. 1053) providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. REAGAN. As I concur with the view of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who has raised this point of order, I wish to office of Representative, if it may be called an office, is peculiar to itself; it has constitutional functions. The mode of election of Representatives to Congress is provided by the second section of the first article of the Constitution. Representatives to Congress are to be elected by the qualified electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature in the State in which they are elected.

But a Speaker is not so elected; he is elected, according to the same section of the same article of the Constitution, by the Representatives in Congress. The mode of election and term of office are different. Then he has peculiar constitutional functions attached to his office which are not attached to the office of Representative. The office of Speaker is a constitutional office, a different constitutional office from that of Representative. He is elected by a different constituency to his office; its functions are peculiar, and his election to that office carries with it the possibility of further and higher duties than those of Speaker.

I may refer to some of the duties which a Speaker is called upon to perform, and which a member of the House is not allowed to perform. By the eighth rule of the House it is the duty of the Speaker to sign all By the eighth rule of the House it is the duty of the Speaker to sign all acts, addresses, and joint resolutions, and by the same rule he is authorized to issue writs, warrants, and subpenas. If any one holds the office of Speaker here, whether it be the office of Speaker as elected at the beginning of the session or that of Speaker elected at a subsequent period of the session in the contingency of the disability of the Speaker to be present and perform his duties, he is still Speaker of the House and war is an abstract and all less still Speaker. of the House, and may issue his warrants and subpœnas and writs. If the Speaker is not clothed with the authority which by law makes him such, and his subpæna or his writ should be disobeyed, then by what authority could any one be punished for the disobedience of that subpæna or warrant?

What constitutes a Speaker† In my judgment it is his election as provided by the Constitution and law and the oath of office which he takes. It is insisted that the oath of office of Speaker is the same as that taken by a Representative. It may be so in terms, but it is not the oath taken by the same officer. Before the oath of office was modified by the act of 1862 many officers took the same oath. If the same person should at different times hold a number of these offices, he would be obliged to take the same oath for each office so held.

If, therefore, the act of 1862 requires, as it does, all civil officers could take the oath prescribed, the Speaker is one of those civil officers. And when the regular Speaker is not present, and cannot discharge the duties and fulfill the functions of that office, and the necessities of the case require another to be elected in order to fulfill those duties, then to make him lawfully the Speaker of the House, it seems to me, it is as much his duty to take the oath of office as it is the duty of the Representative to take the oath of office before he can be permitted to sit upon this floor and discharge his duties as a Representa-

I do not care to elaborate this argument further. It is said that precedents are against this. Well, while I have great respect for precedents, and would follow them where there is no just reason for departing from them, I prefer taking the Constitution and the law, where they seem to be plain, for my guide, to taking precedents which seem to be in conflict with the Constitution, the law, and the rules of this

It may be said that though the regular Speaker may be required to take this oath there is no necessity for a Speaker pro tempore to take it. If there is no necessity for his taking it, how can he be expected to exercise the functions and the authority conferred upon him by the Constitution and laws? He can only do it by virtue of being the Speaker of this House for the time being. In my judgment he can only be the Speaker of this House by being elected by the House to the position, (however short the period may be, if he is elected Speaker pro tempore,) and by taking the eath of office which clothes him with the official authority and power to exercise the duties of that office.

For these reasons I shall vote to sustain the point made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Garfield,] because it seems to me that the Speaker is an officer of the House as Speaker, and that he ought to be clothed with all the authority with which the law can clothe him, by his performing every act which may contribute to invest him with that authority. that authority.

Mr. BLAINE obtained the floor, and said: I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. DENISON.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, this is a question in which I assume there can be no desire on the part of any one here except only to do that which is right. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the statute to which he has called our attention does, in my view, settle this question exactly. It provides that a person entering upon an office shall take an oath that he will fulfill the duties upon which he is about to enter. Now I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the gentleman now occupying the chair was about to enter upon that office when he took the oath some months ago? It seems to me clear that he was not about to take that office, because gentlemen on the other side, by their caucus, had settled that somebody else was about to take it.

Now, the Speaker of the House, who so honorably occupies the chair when he is here, took the oath that he would fulfill the duties of the office upon which he was about to enter: the duties of the office of Speaker. He then administered the oath to all the other members of the House, who took the oath of the office upon which they were about to enter: the office of Representative in the Congress of the United States. Now this body has elected another gentleman to occupy that chair. It is an office upon which he was not about to enter until now; and by the statute he must expressly take the oath of the office upon which he is about to enter. It seems to me that the matter is clearly settled by the terms of the statute.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a ques-

Mr. DENISON.

Mr. DENISON. Yes, sir.
Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman stated his first proposition so clearly that I wish to ask him where he gets his evidence of the fact that the position of Speaker pro tempore is an office. Does he get it from the statute or from the rules of the House? Where is the evidence that the position of Speaker pro tempore is an office within the meaning of the statute?

Mr. DENISON. I have not examined that question, Mr. Speaker,

Mr. WHEELER. It is a very material question, and in my judgment the one upon which the whole matter hinges. I hold that this is simply a question of propriety, not of law. The Constitution provides that "each House may determine the rules of its own proceedings." This matter, in my judgment, arises in the course of the proceedings of the House as a simple question of propriety not of law. ceedings of the House as a simple question of propriety, not of law, because this office is not known to the statute and it is known to the rules only for the day, not to extend beyond the session of the House.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wheeler] seems to argue the point rather than ask a question. I was about to answer that I had not examined the matter; but it seems to me that a person who is elected now to office, to hold upon his shoulders all the duties and responsibilities that the Speaker has held, is now in office as an officer. I make this suggestion to the gentleman from New York: Suppose the Speaker should never return, we stand here with a Speaker; we certainly are not without that officer. If the permanent Speaker should die to-morrow, the present occupant of the chair is the officer.

Mr. BLAINE. O, no; not at all.
Mr. DENISON. Well, perhaps not if the Speaker should die; but, if he should never return, we have the office filled all the time; and I insist that the occupant of the chair is the officer, because he fulfills all the duties of the office; all the responsibilities of the office are upon his shoulders.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] so forcibly presented his views on this matter I was inclined to think that there was some ground for the position he took.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know what resolution is before the House.

what resolution is before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. That the oath of office be administered to the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. BLAINE. My judgment, Mr. Speaker, is that the usage of the House in past years is founded upon the proprieties of the case and that there is no necessity whatever for administering to the Speaker pro tempore any other oath than that which he has already taken. Gentlemen have cited here the fact that one of the functions, and one of the important functions, which the Speaker may perform is that of issuing subpœnas for witnesses—legal summonses to bring men from their places of residence to testify here. So may the chairman of any committee. You authorize a committee to send for persons and papers, and forthwith the chairman of the committee is invested with that power. He is invested with a new function by resolution of the House. When we all stood here on the first day of the session and took the oath to discharge well and faithfully the duties of the office on which we were about to enter, we did not know which of the several functions of the House we might be called upon to perform. Any member of the House is liable to be called upon to discharge the duties of the Speaker pro tempore. He took the oath, the first day of the session, that whether assigned to one committee or the other, whether made chairman or subordinate member, whether authorized to send for persons or papers or not, whether called to the chair as Speaker pro tempore or to the discharge of any other function which might happen to a member, he would well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office. And the only office which the honorable gentleman who now occupies the Chair holds is that of a Representative from the State of New York tive from the State of New York.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wheeler] has already called attention to the fact that it constitutes no separate office. It is simply the ministerial performance of certain duties in the absence of the occupant of that office.

Mr. RÉAGAN. It is suggested that the chairman of a committee may issue a subpœna for a witness. Do I understand the gentleman orrectly?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly; the House may authorize him.

Mr. REAGAN. And I suggest to the gentleman they may do it because the law authorizes it.

Mr. BLAINE. The law is what the House consents to, and when the chairman of a committee is authorized to send for persons and papers an entirely new function is imparted to him; but he does not swear he will well and faithfully discharge the duties of that office; it is included in the general oath which we all take at the beginning of the session. Whatever duties may be devolved upon us, whatever additional responsibilities may be imposed upon us by the House, whether that of chairman of a committee or chairman of the Committee of the Whole, or that of Speaker pro tempore, the oath is inclusive and binds the gentleman who occupies the chair now just as much as though an additional oath were administered to him.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me interrupt the gentleman for a moment. Mr. GARFIELD. Why was Mr. Pomeroy sworn in ?

Mr. BLAINE. He was made absolutely the Speaker of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. He was made absolutely the Speaker of the House.
Mr. WHEELER. An office known to the law!
Mr. BLAINE. Yes, sir; an office known to the law.
Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly for a day, and this is for a week.
Mr. BLAINE. But you will observe that Mr. Pomeroy was absolutely Speaker of the House for the time he held the chair just as much as the gentleman who vacated it.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to finish that point. The case of Mr. Pomeroy must not be confused with the case of a Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. Colfax, Speaker of the House, had been elected Vice-President of the United States, and preparatory to his inauguration into that office he resigned the office of Speaker of this House; he resigned not only his speakership but his membership, was no longer in this House, and the House then called a Speaker pro tempore to the chair, Mr. Wilson, of Iowa—mark you, Mr. Speaker, he had appointed a Speaker pro tempore, and he was in the chair, and presided when Mr. Pomeroy was made Speaker. As soon as Mr. Pomeroy entered upon that office, which was a constitutional office, of course he took the oath, but he was as absolutely Speaker of the House as the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Kerr,] whose absence we now regret, is to-day. Just the same precisely, and there is no parallel at all between the case of Mr. Pomeroy and that of the honorable occupant of the chair at the present time.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me—
Mr. BLAINE. I will hear the gentleman with pleasure.
Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say, with deference, that it seems to me the gentleman from Maine assumes in his argument the very point in issue.
The law authorizes the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, or the chairman of a Committee of the Whole, or the chairman of any committee of either House of Congress, to administer oaths to witnesses, to examine them, &c. Is the Speaker of the House when elected pro tempore in the absence of the Speaker not qualified for the discharge of the duties of the office after taking an oath of office as Speaker? I understand that to be the precise question.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not see anything in the point made by the gentleman from Texas. A long while before the law was passed it was a function of this House, without that law, to impart that power to any one of its committees. You may impart different functions without the taking of any oath to discharge those separate duties. It seems to me the case of the gentleman now presiding is parallel with that of the function which may be imparted to the chairman of a committee, the added functions which may reach any member of the House, and which it seems to me is covered by the oath taken at the outset "well and faithfully to discharge the duties of the office" upon which we

Mr. RANDALL. I now call for a vote.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to fill up the suggestion I made. If the Speaker pro tempore is required to take an oath of office, it must be under the rules of the House, or under the United States statutes. Now I wish some gentleman to state where the warrant or requisition is to be found in either. I hear no response.

Mr. LAWRENCE. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. WHEELER. If it is required of the Speaker pro tempore to take an oath of office, the requirement must be found in the rules of the House or the statutes of the United States. Where is it?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will find it.

Mr. WHEELER. The only Speaker pro tempore known to the rule is one who may preside for a day and whose functions do not extend beyond an adjournment. The neglect to provide for such a contingency as this was clearly a casus omissus.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman from New York think it necessary to elect a Speaker pro tempore every morning? [After a pause. The gentleman does not reply. His argument seems to imply that that should be done.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The question now before the House is not settled by the precedents prior to the act of Congress of 1862. There are perhaps two or three cases where a Speaker pro tempore was elected and where it does not specifically appear whether he took the oath of and where it does not specifically appear whether he took the oath of office or not. Since 1862, one case certainly has been presented where a Speaker pro tempore did take the oath of office.

Mr. BLAINE. Who was that?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Pomeroy.

Mr. BLAINE. He was Speaker.

Mr. WHEELER. He was absolutely Speaker of the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Just at the close of the session the Speaker resigned and Pomeroy was elected Speaker for a single day. taken the oath of office as a Representative and he took an additional oath as Speaker. The question now made is not settled by precedent, but the case of Mr. Pomeroy is certainly an authority now in favor of requiring the additional oath. It is important now that the pending question be settled and that it be settled right. It is, as has been very question be settled and that it be settled right. It is, as seen very justly observed, by no means a party question, and if there be doubt about it, it is better to settle it in accordance with the general usage as to officers who are uniformly required to take official oaths. It is better not to omit or fail to do that which may be found useful. It is better on grounds of public policy to require the sanction and obligation of an oath on the office of the Speaker pro tempore.

Now, sir, I invite the attention of the House, just for a moment, to two or three considerations which I think ought to be conclusive of this question. The Constitution of the United States provides that the House of Representatives shall choose "their Speaker and other It was not necessary that the Constitution should have so officers." officers." It was not necessary that the Constitution should have so provided, because the common law, the lex parliamentaria, expressly made this provision. The clause of the Constitution to which I have referred is merely declaratory of the common parliamentary law. The House would have the power to elect a Speaker independently of the Constitution. Then we have a Speaker who derives his authority from the Constitution and from general parliamentary law back of the Constitution, and he is an "officer."

By common parliamentary law, the Speaker may during a session of the House call on a member to preside. On page 218 of the Digest I find it stated:

The Speaker shall have a right to name any member to perform the duties of the chair, but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment.

This is a rule of the House. It does not result from any express provision of the Constitution or of any statute. The rule itself is only declaratory of common parliamentary law.

But a member performing the duties of the Chair does not become Speaker. He is not an officer. He cannot sign bills. He cannot perform any one of the duties of the office except for the time being to preside. He merely takes the place of the Speaker to perform the duties of the Chair, to preside temporarily, and he cannot perform this duty beyond an adjournment. He is not an officer. He is called to the chair as a matter of necessity, merely for the convenience of the House, and he does not in any sense become an officer of the House. His acts are the acts of the Speaker. He is not Speaker.

But it may happen that the Speaker of the House may be sick, absent for a day, or a week, or a month, or for the whole residue of the session, or for the whole residue of the Congress. What is to be done then? My friend from New York [Mr. WHEELER] speaks of a casus omissus. There is no casus omissus. Neither the Constitution nor the statute makes provision, indeed, for the election of a Speaker pro tempore, but the general parliamentary law does—the common parliamentary law; and it is just as much in force as though it were written in the Constitution or penned down in a statute. For after all the Constitution and statutes and treaties are only laws; but the common law is just as much law and just as obligatory as the highest constitutional law we have.

What, then, does this common parliamentary law provide? Why, sir, it says, as I find it said in the Digest:

Where the Speaker has been ill other Speakers pro tempore have been appointed. In other words, there is in this House an inherent power to appoint a Speaker pro tempore. What is he? He is a Speaker—a Speaker pro tempore indeed, but still a Speaker. The expression pro tempore implies only a limitation which may or may not happen to the existence of his term during the Congress. It relates to his term, and not to the functions of his office. He is Speaker. He is an officer, and the reason why he is an officer is that he performs every duty which the Speaker, the regular Speaker for the entire Congress, may perform. If he is not Speaker, let some gentleman tell me what single function of the Speaker does he lack. He signs bills. He issues warrants to summon witnesses to go before investigating committees. He has power to issue warrants for the arrest of members who refuse to attend the sittings of the House. He becomes President of the United States in a contingency during the time he continues to hold his place as Speaker pro tempore. A Speaker may die, and still the Speaker pro tempore is Speaker.

Mr. BLAINE. O, no, no. The gentleman will pardon me. If such a calamity as that should occur it would have just the same effect as the Speaker's resignation. Suppose the gentleman who is Speaker of the House should resign or were to die, the gentleman who occupies the chair in his absence drops with him wholly and entirely.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The last statement I made is not at all essential to my argument.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course, the gentleman retracts it.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course, the gentleman retracts it.
Mr. LAWRENCE. I could scarcely venture an opinion against a gentleman so learned in parliamentary law as my friend from Maine is on the particular question suggested, for he may be correct. But I would rather see it in a book.

generally believe what is written in a book, but I cannot always believe what is said outside of it. In other words, I mean only to say I would be glad to see the authority of a book on this question. We all know, sir, that upon the death of Vice-President Wilson it was determined in the Senate that the President pro tempore of the Senate did not vacate his office. Now, that is an authority against the distinguished gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] Then, Mr. Speaker, you are Speaker, or will be when you take the oath of office; you will then be Speaker de jure as you are now de facto.

Now, sir, I come to the question, Is there any law which requires a Speaker pro tempore to take an oath of office? There are two statutes relating to the matter.

Mr. KASSON. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] leaves that part of the subject, I wish to read a clause from the Revised Statutes which, I think, tends to clear up one phase of this question. It is section 145:

In case of removal, death, resignation, or disability of both the President and Vice-President of the United States, the President of the Senate, or, if there is none, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the time being, shall act as President until the disability is removed or a President elected.

Thus showing, sir, that if you are Speaker of the House "for the time being," or, in other words pro tempore, when that casualty occurs, it is you, as the elected Speaker and de facto Speaker, who become President, because you are the "Speaker for the time being" when the event occurs. Suppose, in other words, that our present Speaker, the one specially elected at the commencement of the session, should be in Italy when this event occurred and you are Speaker "for the time being" in Washington, can any one maintain that this country would be without a Chief Magistrate until the Speaker originally elected and whose place you have now been elected to fill returned from a foreign country?

Mr. SAMPSON. I would like to ask my colleague from Iowa [Mr.

Kasson] a question.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman from Iowa has yielded the floor.

I concur entirely in what he has said, except that I insist that a Speaker pro tempore who has taken the oath of office for the time being is Speaker de jure as well as de facto while acting in the absence of the Speaker.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the next inquiry is, is there any law which requires the Speaker pro tempore to take an oath of office. There are two laws in relation to oaths of office. Here is the act of 1862, which is found in section 1756 of the Revised Statutes. In its broad, comprehensive terms it would cover the case of the Speaker pro tempore. It provides that-

Every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit either in the civil, military, or naval service, excepting the President and the persons embraced by the section following, shall, before entering upon the duties of said office, and before being entitled to any part of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following outh.

The section then recites the form of the cath.

This statute is broad enough in its terms to include a Speaker pro tempore, because he is "appointed to an office of honor in the civil He is within the very terms of the statute, and this statute service." He is within the very terms of the statute, and this statute does apply to the Speaker pro tempore, unless his case is covered by another statute, to which I will call attention.

I am free to confess that this statute is not the one which applies to this case, and the reason is that there is a particular statute which does more immediately and specifically apply to it. What is it? Why, sir, section 30 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

At the first session of Congress after every general election of Representatives the oath of office shall be administered by any member of the House of Representatives to the Speaker; and by the Speaker to all the Members and Delegates present, and to the Clerk, previous to entering on any other basiness, and to the Members and Delegates present, and to the Clerk, previous to entering on any other basiness, and to the Members and Delegates who afterward appear, previous to the taking their seats.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wheeler] says this does not apply to the Speaker pro tempore. As to this officer he says there is a casus omissus. I say this law does apply to the case of a Speaker pro tempore. What is the rule of construction? I have before me Sedgwick on the Construction of Statutes. I received it since I commenced speaking and am not now able to turn to the passage, but I can state from recollection the general rule of construction applicacable to the case, and that is, that-

Whenever a case falls within the purpose of the statute it is within the statute, whether its mere words cover it or not.

In other words, in constraing a statute you are not to take its literal words alone and be governed by them. In such case the legal maxim may well be applied: "Qui haret in litera haret in cortice."

Ascertain the purpose of the statute, its object, and it applies to all persons within its object, whether they would seem to be literally covered by the strict words of the statute or not. Now, sir, why do you require the Speaker to take the oath of office?

It is, sir, that you may impose upon him the obligations which an oath is supposed to impose in relation to his official duties, and which, in fact, it does to every conscientious man. That is the reason for it. Tell me now why that reason does not apply to the Speaker pro tempore. Shall the Speaker for the whole term be under this obligation and the Speaker pro tempore, who may fill the whole term and discharge the duties of the office, be under no such obligation? The reason of the law is the life of the law, and the reason applies as well in the one case as in the other.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. It seems to me that he does not come to the point that was made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wheeler.] Now, I agree in the main with the gentleman from Ohio.

The question, it seems to me, is this: Are there two distinct officers, a Speaker and a Speaker pro tempore? As I understand the rules of this House and the law, there are no such two distinct officers who can exist contemporaneously. The rules of the House do not provide for them; the rules and the law do not recognize a Speaker pro tempore. But they do recognize the fact that during the day the absolute, acting Speaker may call a member of the House to the chair to act the presiding officer of the House; but he does not thereby become the the presiding officer of the House; but he does not thereby become the Speaker of the House. As for the use of the term "pro tempore," it seems to me that applies only to the duration of the office.

By the resolution adopted by the House this morning the late

Speaker has been in effect removed; he is no longer Speaker, and will not be Speaker again until he shall return and take the chair, within a longer or a shorter time. Until he shall return and occupy the chair and resume the functions of his office as Speaker, he is no longer the acting Speaker, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] is Speaker, to all intent and purposes during the term for which the late

Speaker is absent.
Mr. BEEBE. Will Mr. KERR have to be sworn in again when he

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly not.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly not.

Mr. REAGAN. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] supposing the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] was through with his remarks.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly not; I am not through. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] for a few moments.

Mr. REAGAN. I am allowed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] to answer the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.] In doing so I will at the same time give an answer to the question.

In doing so I will at the same time give an answer to the question which was asked by the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wheeler.] His assumption seemed to be that a new Speaker protempore should be appointed every morning. He asks under what law can elect a Speaker pro tempore. I answer, under the common

parliamentary law.

If I am asked if that common parliamentary law is a part of the law of the land, I will refer particularly to what is said by Mr. Justice Story in treating of the question of impeachment, which relates more particularly to the action of the Senate. He calls attention, in the discussion of that question, to the fact that but few men have ever been impeached before the Senate except for offenses not defined by law and for offenses at common law and for exception. by law, only for offenses at common law and for political offenses. The question has been discussed by the ablest men and jurists of the country. It is assumed by Mr. Justice Story as the correct determination of that question that we have incorporated into the body of our law the common parliamentary law of this country and of England. Adopting that common parliamentary law, we do not permit this House to become dissolved by the temporary absence or inability of the Speaker to discharge his duties. And by our rule, by the common parliamentary law, we elect a Speaker pro tempore to perform those duties.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I agree entirely with the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] that the Speaker pro tempore is an officer of this House, and is elected by virtue of the common parliamentary law which is recognized in every legislative body in the world. My friend from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] fails to remember the fact that a member called, as the Digest says, "to perform the duties of the Chair" during a single sitting of the House, and not beyond an adjournment, does not have the official attributes, authority, or character of a Speaker, or of a Speaker elected as such pro tempore. There are three provisions for presiding over the deliberations of the House: First, by the Speaker; second, the Speaker pro tempore, each of whom have equal powers; and then, third, a member may by either of these officers be called "to perform the duties of the Chair," but not beyond an adjournment. He is in no sense the Speaker of the House, except merely to preside for the time being. He temporarily experience of the House, except merely to preside for the time being. rarily exercises one duty of a Speaker only. He does not sign bills, or issue warrants, or administer the oath of office to new members, or perform any official duty except to preside for the time being. His functions are recognized by usage, which is parliamentary law, but he does not rise to the official dignity, clothed with all the powers, of Speaker, and so is not required to take an oath of office.

But the point I was making when I yielded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Burchard] is this, that the Speaker pro tempore falls within the object and the spirit and purpose of the statute which requires a Speaker to take an oath of office. I have heard no answer to this allegation. I do not believe there is any.

Mr. BLAINE. Why should not the President pro tempore of the Senate take an oath of office?

Mr. J. A. W. DENGER. High conditions the property of the Senate take an oath of office?

Senate take an oath of office?

Mr. LAWRENCE. He should.

Mr. BLAINE. But he does not.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then he does not do his duty.

Mr. BLAINE. Ah!

Mr. LAWRENCE. He is a Senator, and as such has duties. As such he takes an oath of office. When he is elected President of the Senate he assumes new duties. They are official duties. He is to preside impartially, appoint committees of conference, and perform other duties. Why should he be relieved of the obligation imposed by an duties. Why should be be relieved of the obligation imposed by an oath to "faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of the office?" He is within the statute of 1862. He is "elected to an office of honor." If the President pro tempore of the Senate takes no oath of office, as such, I hope we will now set a precedent here which will teach some law over in the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him further, I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. I understood the gentleman to mention that, if the honorable gentleman from Indiana, now Speaker of the House, [Mr. Kerr,] and now absent, should send in his resignation to-morrow, that would make the honorable occupant of the chair at this time the Speaker of the House for the remainder of this Congress

Mr. LAWRENCE. That question is not material to the point I am now making, although it is very ingenious.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought the gentleman said the present occupant of the chair was the actual Speaker.

Mr. LAWRENGE. He is.
Mr. BLAINE. Well, if we administer the oath of office to him as the actual Speaker, do we not by that declare that he is entitled to $8,000 a year for the time he shall so act?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLAINE.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.
Mr. LAWRENCE. If the distinguished gentleman who is now presiding over us, when he shall have taken the oath of office, is not the Speaker of this House what is he?

Mr. BLAINE. He is Speaker pro tempore.
Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly; and is not the Speaker pro tempore a Speaker?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; no more than the President pro tempore of the Senate is Vice-President. The Senate may elect a President protempore but it cannot make a Vice-President. This House may make any member of the House the Speaker pro tempore by its declaration to that effect; but it cannot elect a Speaker so long as the Speakership is already occupied by another man. When the office is vacated, snip is already occupied by another man. When the omce is vacated, we have the power to fill it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. There is no analogy between the case of the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. When the Speaker takes the oath, does he take it as Speaker or as a member of Congress? When the Speaker takes his oath under the statute, it may be administered by a member of the House, and then in his turn he administers the oath to the other manners of the House. members of the House. Does he not take the oath simply as a member of the House? Does he not exercise functions every day as a member of the House, as, for instance, in casting his vote when there

Mr. LAWRENCE. My friend certainly must be aware that the Speaker takes an oath of office as a Representative in Congress, and when he is elected Speaker he then takes an oath as Speaker.

Mr. HARRISON. He takes but one oath.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Our Speaker, Mr. KERR, took both oaths.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. HARRISON. He took but a single oath, which was administered upon his election as Speaker. Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Pomeroy took two oaths. I say that the law requires an oath of office.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman one question. While the Constitution provides expressly that the President pro tempere of the Senate shall be elected by the Senate as an officer, and while it also provides expressly that the Speaker of the House shall be elected by the House, what other officer can there be but such Speaker as the Constitution provides for; and how can parliamentary law control the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. LAWRENCE. The Constitution of the United States does not exclude the obligation to take an oath of office.

Mr. Speaker, I was correct in saying that the Speaker of this House took two oaths. Gentlemen broke me off before I had said all I intended to say on that point. Let me illustrate. Before Mr. KERR took the oath of office he was elected Speaker. He then took the double obligation to perform his duties as a Representative in Congress and also as Speaker. The two oaths were embodied in one, applying to the discharge of the duties of both offices: the office of Representative and the office of Speaker. In taking the oath after he was elected Speaker, it was a double oath to perform the duties of the two offices. But Mr. Pomeroy having served for a time as a Representative, and having taken the oath as a Representative, he was afterward elected Speaker pro tempore, and then took the oath of office as Speaker. That is the sense in which I intended to say the Speaker took two oaths. Questions have been crowded upon me so fast, I have been unable to answer any one before another has come.

It is said that, if the Speaker should die or resign, that moment the functions of the Speaker pro tempore would cease. But I do not so understand it. Why would they cease? No authority on parliamentary law—I mean no book—has been cited to this effect. There mentary law—I mean no book—has been cited to this effect.
is no reason why it should be so. None is given.

When Vice-President Wilson died the President of the Senate pro tempore continued to act. So would the Speaker pro tempore continue here. The House has power at any time to elect a new Speaker or a new Speaker pro tempore. Jefferson's Manual says:

A Speaker may be removed at the will of the House and a Speaker pro tempore

Would not the Speaker pro tempore continue to be Speaker until removed by the House? Most certainly. But if the resignation of a Speaker could terminate the official powers of a Speaker pro tempore (as it cannot) this does not prove that the Speaker pro tempore is not an officer or relieve him of the duty imposed by statute and reason to take an oath of office.

It is urged that there cannot be two Speakers. It must be confessed there is a Speaker and a Speaker pro tempore; both are Speakers; both are officers. The qualification of "pro tempore" does not affect the official character or powers or duties of the Speaker pro tempore, but relates only to the duration of the office or its liability to be terminated by the return of the Speaker. Just now the absent Speaker has a title to the office vested in him, a right de jure, with a right to return and assume the duties of the office; thus uniting the de jure right with a de facto exercise of the duties of the office. But he is not now exercising the functions of the office. He is not de facto Speaker now in the exercise of his official functions. In his absence the gentleman now in the chair (when he takes the oath of office) will equally be de jure a Speaker, and besides de facto a Speaker, exercising lawfully all the duties of the office, and with a right to do so for a period of time indefinite in duration, a period to be terminated by a contingency: the return of the Speaker. Here then are nated by a contingency: the return of the Speaker. Here then are two Speakers: the absent Speaker, with a de jure right to assume the exercise of the office, but who is not now exercising its duties, and is therefore not acting as Speaker—is not de facto Speaker—and the Speaker pro tempore who is such de jure and de facto. He does not stand in the relation of a "deputy" to the Speaker. He is more, for the position of a deputy implies that he and his principal both may be acting, de jure and de facto. There may be a clerk and a deputy clerk. Both are clerks. Both must take an oath of office; both are officers. Either can exercise all the duties of the office. Both are officers. Either can exercise all the duties of the office. Both are clerks, and a fortiori there may be two Speakers.

But if the office of Speaker and Speaker pro tempore are really distinct offices, they are still offices. Those who discharge their duties are officers, and as such they are within the statute requiring an oath of office.

The question who is entitled now to the salary of the office of Speaker does not necessarily arise. It does not affect the question whether a Speaker pro tempore is an officer required to take an oath of office.

And now, Mr. Speaker, if there be even doubt about this question, it is best to resolve it in favor of taking the oath. There is safety in resolving it in that manner. Let us have the security which that course gives. Why not? Will gentlemen tell me why not? We should adopt a rule which is founded in reason, which rests on a purpose, which will be fruitful of good consequences, which can be productive of no evil results.

I have thus given my views as they have occurred to me. When I came into the House I found this subject under discussion. I was not aware it was to arise until I came in. I believe that sound policy requires that an oath of office be administered.

I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]
Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the House but a moment, and only desire to do so because the statement which I made a few moments ago was received with apparent surprise or incredulity by gentle-men for whose opinion I have very great respect. Is aid that the elected and sworn officer of this House, performing all the duties of Speaker at the time when a contingency occurs under the law subjecting that officer to other duties, must discharge these additional duties if the contingency happens during his incumbency, although his term of office is pro tempore. That was the proposition. The surprise with which it was received arose apparently from the view that the House, having once elected a Speaker at the beginning of the session, has exhausted its power, and can never make another Speaker, except in the case of resignation, disability, or death. Now, I affirm that the House has it in its power any morning that it meets in session here to remove its Speaker and elect another, or to limit the time during which any member may act as Speaker; and that there can be but one officer at the same time entitled to discharge the duties of Speaker of the

The error arises, I apprehend, from a confusion created by these two little words borrowed from the Latin—pro tempore. What says Jefferson in his manual? He declares that a Speaker may be removed at the will of the House and a Speaker pro tempore appointed. But such a Speaker pro tempore would be the only Speaker the House would have after removal of the prior Speaker.

Why pro tempore? Because he holds for a time; whether limited by law or by custom, whether de facto or otherwise, he is for the time Speaker of the House.

And the House has it in its power to appoint a Speaker any day. What has the House done this morning, sir ? They have provided a Speaker by election, and will so notify the Senate and the President. And he is the only Speaker that this House has, or can recognize, until by virtue of that resolution of the House another Speaker comes back to this place, or we have by further resolution provided other-

Mr. BEEBE. I rise to a point of order. Accepting the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa—

Mr. KASSON. That is not a point of order.

Mr. BEEBE. I do rise to a point of order. There being no Speaker from the stand-point of the gentleman from Iowa, he has not addressed the Speaker, and is therefore not in order. [Laughter.] But I withdraw the point of order.

draw the point of order.

Mr. KASSON. It is always in order to have a Speaker, and that is what I am trying to secure. Let me go on; and I beg gentlemen will not interrupt me while I state my proposition. We have then a Speaker, and under this resolution his term of office is fixed. What is that term of office? It is during the "present absence" of the previous Speaker of this House. Then Hon. S. S. Cox, a Representative from the State of New York, is this Speaker and the only Speaker; and in my judgment, in the absence of statutory regulation, the salary due to the Speaker during his service as such could be drawn by this sworn Speaker who is such by election of this House, if that this sworn Speaker, who is such by election of this House, if that point should ever be made. He will take what he is entitled to during the time he is Speaker; at other times he has his pay as member. I undertake to say that under the law my point is sustained by sound argument; that this House can have but one Speaker at a time in the nature of things; and that if the honorable member from New York is Speaker, then during the time for which he is elected and serving he is in all respects entitled to all the rights and privileges of Speaker even to the contingency of becoming President of the United

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether, in his judgment, there is any distinction between a Speaker pro tempore appointed by the Speaker of the House for a day or for a part of a day and a Speaker pro tempore elected by the House itself for a week or a month?

Mr. KASSON. Unquestionably there is a very great difference. For when a temporary presiding officer is selected by the Speaker, under our rules he is not such a Speaker as is made by the election of this House. The presiding officer to whom the gentleman from Kentucky refers is made by the Speaker under the rule of the House and for a day only and merely as presiding officer, without the other func-

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Now the present presiding officer of this House has been elected by the House this morning. I therefore contend that his duties are different and of a much higher order than those of a presiding officer selected for a day or part of a day by the Speaker of the House under the rules.

Mr. KASSON. There is no doubt about that, for the presiding officer appointed temporarily by the Speaker for a day or part of a day can sign no bills, nor vouchers, nor correct the Journal, &c.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Therefore in my judgment, Mr. Speaker,
I hold that the present occupant of the chair, elected this morning as Speaker pro tempore, ought to be sworn precisely as the Speaker elected originally was sworn.

Mr. KASSON. I believe I have stated my points so that they are understood. That is all I desire.

Mr. KNOTT took the floor.

Mr. KNOTT. Before proceeding, I will yield for three minutes to

Mr. KNOTT. Before proceeding, I will yield for three minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hoskins.]
Mr. Hoskins. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House to the extent of three minutes even. The first thing to which I desire to call the attention of the House is the second section of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that the House of Representatives shall choose their own Speaker and other officers. In the third section it is provided that the Senate shall choose their own officers and also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President. In the Senate they have a right under the Constitution to choose a President pro tempore. There is no law upon the statute-book, so far as I am advised, requiring in the Senate the oath of office to be administered to the President pro tempore. The Constitution of the United States provides only that in the absence of the Vice-President such officer shall be elected. No oath of office is administered to the President pro tempore of the Senate, for the reason that there is no law requiring it.

ministered to the President pro tempore of the Senate, for the reason that there is no law requiring it.

Now, then, if it be true there is no law requiring the President pro tempore of the Senate to take an additional oath, I ask gentlemen of the House where is the statute providing that the Speaker pro tempore shall be required to take an additional oath before he enters upon the duties of presiding officer? Why have we elected as Speaker pro tempore of this House the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX?]. For no other reason than the rules of the House declare that the Cox ?] For no other reason than the rules of the House declare that the Speaker cannot designate a Speaker pro tempore longer than one day. In the absence of that rule there is no law to prevent the Speaker

In the absence of that rule there is no law to prevent the Speaker designating a Speaker pro tempore for three or five or ten days or even for thirty days. The rule of the House steps in and says the presiding officer cannot appoint a Speaker pro tempore beyond one day, and that is the reason why this House has elected a Speaker pro tempore.

The Speaker pro tempore designated by the Speaker of the House exercises the same powers and discharges the same duties as the Speaker pro tempore elected by the House; no more, no less. He exercises precisely the same powers; and I cannot see why under certain conditions he may not, as may the Speaker pro tempore elected by the House, sign bills. There is no power given to the Speaker elected by the House pro tempore than is conferred where the Speaker himself appoints a member to take the chair temporarily as Speaker. The Speaker pro tempore called to the chair by the Speaker cannot The Speaker pro tempore called to the chair by the Speaker cannot draw the pay of Speaker, nor can the gentleman who is appointed Speaker pro tempore by the action of the House draw that salary. And I again repeat that the functions of the Speaker pro tempore elected by the House are no more than the functions he enjoys when designated by the Speaker of the House. And in the absence of any law or any rule of this House requiring it, I submit that an additional oath is not necessary to be administered to the Speaker elected pro tempore, for the reasons stated and also for the additional reason that, tempore, for the reasons stated and also for the additional reason that, when the gentleman now occupying the chair stood before that desk and took the oath that he would fairly and fully and to the extent of his ability discharge the duty of a member of Congress, among those duties of a member of Congress, as it turns out, is that he should discharge the duties of Speaker pro tempore. He is as much bound by the oath he has taken to faithfully discharge the duties incident to his being a member of Congress, one of which now is to act as Speaker pro tempore, as he could be bound by any additional oath.

I can find nothing in the Constitution no statute law nor any role.

I can find nothing in the Constitution, no statute-law, nor any rule of this House, requiring an additional oath to be administered to a Speaker pro tempore, either made so by the Speaker or where he is designated direct by the action of the House, as in this case. I shall therefore vote against the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. KNOTT. With all deference to the distinguished gentlemen who have participated in this debate on either side, it occurs to me that, considering the exceeding brevity of human life, we have consumed a great deal of the valuable time of the House and of the country in discussing a question of no practical importance what-ever, a question of mere empty formality. If the Speaker pro tempore is not an officer, no gentleman will pretend that there is any authority anywhere to require him to take any oath whatever. If he is an officer, being where he is under color of authority, his acts whatever he may do are just as binding and valid without his having taken an oath at all as they would be if he had taken as many oaths as were sworn by "our army in Flanders." And that is the end of the whole question

Mr. LAPHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question ?

Mr. KNOTT. The House is getting impatient and I desire to cut this whole thing short by moving that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] do lie upon the table.

Mr. RANDALL. And I call the previous question on that motion.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to call the attention of the House to a provision of the statutes. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to do this.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to lay the motion of the gentleman from Ohio on the table, and upon that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] demands the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that we vote on the motion itself. result will be valuable in the future in whatever way it is decided. Let the question be settled on its merits. I am willing that debate shall now close, and that the House come to a vote on my motion. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] will withdraw his motion to lay on the table I will call the previous question on my motion, and let the sense of the House be taken on its merits.

Mr. KNOTT. Then I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. And I call the previous question on my motion. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; hich was on agreeing to Mr. GARFIELD'S motion.
Mr. BEEBE. Let the House distinctly understand what that motion is on which it is to vote.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask that the motion be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio is that the present occupant of the chair be required to take the oath of office.

The question being taken, on a division by sound, the Speaker pro tempore said that in the judgment of the Chair the "noes" had it.

Mr. GARFIELD called for a division.

The House divided; and there were-ayes 62, noes 135.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I call for the yeas and nays.
On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 24, noes 124; the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote.
Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.
On ordering tellers there were ayes 32; more than one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers on the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that, as the number for tellers is sufficient to order the yeas and nays, the yeas and nays be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 73, nays 170, not voting 46; as follows:

APPROVAL OF THE JOURNAL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asks if there is any objection to the Journal of yesterday's proceedings being approved, as it has not yet been read.

There was no objection, and the Journal was approved.

NOTIFICATION TO THE SENATE.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following resolution, on which I ask the previous question:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives has appointed Hon. SAMUEL S. Cox, a Representative in the House from the State of New York, Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered: and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCRARY. I rise to call up the special order, which I believe takes precedence of all other business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order to-day is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1798) to re-organize the judiciary of the United States, which was made the special order for February 16, at two o'clock, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other business except the regular appropriation

Mr. CONGER. Not until after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan will understand that the unfinished business takes precedence by Rules

Mr. McCRARY. If I am recognized as being entitled to the floor on the judiciary bill, I will yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Morey] to make his personal explanation. How much time does he desire?

Mr. MCREY. O, about two minutes.
Mr. McCRARY. I yield then for two minutes.

Mr. MOREY. I desire first, Mr. Speaker, that the Clerk shall read a portion, which I have marked, from an extract from the Chicago

The Clerk read as follows:

Washington, February 8.

Washington, February 8.

A conclave of carpet-baggers was held to-night in the room of the Senate. Spencer and about sixty of his brethren were in council, the purpose of which was to decide on a policy for a better presentation of the bloody shirt and the upholding of Mortonism. Spencer, in behalf of the committee of which he is the leader, reported that he waited upon Chief Justice Waite, with Morey of Louisiana, and represented to the judge the necessity of an early and favorable decision on the enforcement act. Spencer related in lugabrious tones his discomfiture with the Chief Justice. That gentleman listened to his remarks coldly, and replied, with no evidence of sympathy, that it was not the practice of the supreme bench to discuss decisions before they are rendered, and that, in short, such an appeal from any source was no more nor no less than a contempt of court.

Mr. MOREY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say simply this: I was not at that meeting; I never called upon the Chief Justice with Mr. Spencer, by myself, or with anybody else upon any such subject. I have never spoken on the matter or written on the matter to the Chief Justice or to any member of the Supreme Court. The statement, so far as I am concerned, is utterly untrue and entirely unwarranted.

Mr. FORT. Who supposes you did? Mr. McCRARY. I will now yield to gentlemen who desire to introduce bills for reference merely.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. FRYE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2144) for the further distribution of the Geneva award; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DUTIES ON SUGAR, MOLASSES, AND SALT.

Mr. DE BOLT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2145) to regulate import duties on sugar, molasses, and salt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DE BOLT. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be printed in the RECORD, as it is very short.

No objection was made; and the bill is as follows:

An act to regulate importeduties on sugar, molasses, and salt.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the duties hereinafter mentioned on sugars, molasses, and salt imported from foreign countries.

Sugar not above No. 7, Dutch standard in color, 1 cent per pound.

Sugar above No. 7 and not above No. 10, Dutch standard in color, 14 cents per pound.

Sugar above No. 10 and not above No. 13, Dutch standard in color, 12 cents per

Sugar above No. 13 and not above No. 16, Dutch standard in color, 2 cents per pound.

Sugar above No. 16 and not above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, 2½ cents per

Sugar above No. 10 and not above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, 24 cents per pound.

Sugar above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, and on all refined loaf, lump, crushed, powdered, and granulated sugar, 3 cents per pound. But sirup of sugar, sirup of sugar-cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, or concentrated molasses, entered under the name of molasses, shall be forfeited to the United States.

Sugar-andy, not colored, 8 cents per pound.

All other confectionery not otherwise provided for, made wholly or in part of sugar, and on sugars after being refined, when tinctured, colored, or in any way adulterated, valued at 30 cents per pound or less, 12½ cents per pound.

Confectionery valued above 30 cents per pound, or when sold by the box, package, or otherwise than by the pound, 40 per cent. ad valorem.

Molasses, 4 cents per gallon.

Tank-bottoms, sirup of sugar-cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, and concentrated molasses, 1 cent per pound.

RELIEF OF DISTILLERS.

Mr. KNOTT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2146) for the relief of distillers of spirits by the refunding and repayment of moneys expended or paid and deposited by them for Tice meters; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. WALLING, by unanimous consent, introduced a resolution relative to the survey of the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LANDS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. CASON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2147) ceding lands now worthless and which have never been surveyed or sectionized, but which may be reclaimed and drained by constructing a canal from Lake Michigan, commencing at or near Michigan City and running south through the Kankakee Valley to the Wabash River at or near the city of La Fayette, Indiana, to any corporation that may first organize to construct said canal under the laws of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONERS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. PARSONS, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the senate and house of representatives of Kentucky, relative to Mexican war pensioners; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. PARSONS also, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Kentucky, in relation to the Texas Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM P. HALLIDAY AND S. B. HALLIDAY.

Mr. HARTZELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2148) for the relief of William P. Halliday and S. B. Halliday, of Cairo, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

EMILY SCHWARTZ.

Mr. ELY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2149) to grant a pension to Emily Schwartz, of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAULKNER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a bill (H. R. No. 2150) to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution concerning citizenship and to define certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries and certain duties of diplomatic and consular officers, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McCRARY. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be the order.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. HENDEE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a resolution providing for the printing of the testimony taken before that committee in investigating the affairs of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

LEAVENWORTH STREET RAILROAD COMPANY

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs Senate bill No. 25, granting the right of way to the Leaven-worth Street Railroad Company across the Fort Leavenworth military reservation.

There was no objection; and accordingly the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JEAN LOUIS COMEAUX.

Mr. DARRALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2151) to compensate Jean Louis Comeaux, of the parish of La Fourche, Louisiana, for services rendered the Government of the United States in recruiting and enlisting soldiers during the late war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MORGAN'S LOUISIANA AND TEXAS RAILROAD.

Mr. DARRALL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2152) to relieve the Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad, formerly the New Orleans, Opelousas and Great Western Railroad, from certain conditions imposed by the act of June 3, 1856, chapter 42, section 3; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD C. GARLICK.

Mr. HUNTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2153) for the relief of Edward C. Garlick; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BENICIA ARSENAL, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs Senate bill S. No. 153 granting the right of way for railroad purposes through the United States arsenal grounds near Benicia, California.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be the order.
There being no objection, the bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JOHN W. CAMERON.

Mr. SPARKS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2154) for the relief of the heirs at law of John W. Cameron; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COURT OF WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2155) to establish the court of war claims; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PETER H. WHITEHURST.

Mr. HOGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2156) authorizing the commissioners of claims to re-open the claim of Peter H. Whitehurst, of Norfolk, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

NOTIFYING PRESIDENT OF ELECTION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. HOLMAN submitted the following resolution; which was read considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House inform the President of the United States that Hon. Samuel S. Cox, one of the Representatives from the State of New York, has been appointed Speaker pro tempore during the present temporary absence of the Speaker.

MARKET-HOUSE IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. NEAL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee for the Dis trict of Columbia, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2157) to provide for building a market-house on square No. 446 in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time and ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

SENECA INDIANS, OF NEW YORK.

Mr. NORTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2158) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Seneca Nation of Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservation and to confirm existing leases," approved February 19, 1875; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AARON H. MILLER.

Mr. HAYMOND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2159) granting a pension to Aaron H. Miller, late private Company G, Twenty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1798) to re-organize the judiciary of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLACKBURN.) The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCrary] is entitled to the floor upon this bill.

Mr. McCrary. The question which is presented to the House for its consideration by this bill is by no means a new question. For a long time it has been apparent that something must be done to save the Supreme Court of the United States from being so completely overwhelmed with business as to render an appeal to it in many cases a practical denial of justice. That Court as it is organized to-day is able to transact but little more business than when it was first organized in 1798. It is true that there are now upon the supreme bench nine justices, and that at the beginning there were but six; but, in-asmuch as all the justices necessarily sit together in the hearing of every case, the only relief that the court has secured by the addition of these three justices is in the labor of preparing opinions after decisions have been reached. It is important to take into consideration the further fact that under the judiciary act of 1789 appeals to the Su-preme Court were not permitted upon the facts in any case, since that act provided only for a writ of error for the review of the law. The additional labor imposed upon that court by the later acts giving appeals in equity, admiralty, and prize cases much more than equals the additional working force upon the bench; and hence the court would be less able to discharge its duties to-day than it was eight years ago, even if in the meantime we had added nothing to our population, wealth, or territory. But the growth in the country in these and all other respects has been marvelous.

Let me call the attention of the House very briefly to the vast changes that have occurred in this country since the organization of the Supreme Court. Then we had thirteen States, with a population of less than four millions. Now we have thirty-seven States, besides ten organized Territories, and a population of more than forty millions. At the beginning the Supreme Court of the United States exercised jurisdiction by writ of error over six circuit courts and thirteen district courts. Now that court exercises the same jurisdiction in both appeals and writs of error over fifty-seven district courts, nine circuit courts, ten territorial supreme courts, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and the Court of Claims, making seventy-eight courts. The district courts sit in one hundred different places, and at least twice a year, making two hundred terms per year of those courts. The circuit courts sit in eighty-four places, and, I think, in all the States at least twice a year, making one hundred and sixty-eight terms of the circuit courts. In round numbers I may say that the Supreme Court of the United States to-day exercises appellate jurisdiction over courts which hold at least four hundred terms annually, many of them sitting many months at each term.

Another thing, Mr. Speaker, is important to be noticed. In 1790 the circuit court which was most remote from the city of Washington was located at Savannah, Georgia, a distance of only six hundred and eighty-two miles from this capital. Now, appeals and writs of error are brought to that court from the city of San Francisco, a distance of thirty-one hundred and twenty-three miles; from Portland, in Oregon, a distance of thirty-one hundred and twenty-seven miles, and from several Territories which are more remote or at least more inaccessible than either of these.

The business of the court has steadily increased with the growth of the country, with the increase of our population, with the invention and extension of railroads, with the marvelous increase of our commerce, with the building up of great commercial centers in our large cities, with the business connections extending through many States, and with the expansion of our territory. The House may have some apprehension of the steady and rapid increase of business of this court when I call attention to the fact that in 1810 the calendar of the Supreme Court numbered 93 cases; in 1820, 127 cases; in 1846, 165 cases; in 1856, 266 cases; in 1866, 451 cases; in 1875, 901 cases. This latter number, however, has been increased up to the present date to 931.

The business, then, of the Supreme Court has now reached that point where if that court should sit constantly every day in the year except Sundays, and devote itself with the utmost industry to the disposition of its business, it would require at least three years to dispose of the cases now upon the docket. And since it cannot be expected to sit the year round, we may safely say the court is four or five years behind its work.

There are then, Mr. Speaker, two very grave and serious evils growing out of the present condition of our judiciary. One is the very great distance from the places of the trial below to the only place where great distance from the places of the trial below to the only place where a trial can be had upon appeal; the other is the very great delay which necessarily follows every appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court. I apprehend every gentleman will agree that it is one of the duties of the Government, since it requires its citizens to litigate in its courts, to afford a trial as near as may be to the residence of the citizen, and to afford a final decision as promptly as the circumstances will allow. Under existing circumstances, as I have already intimated, very many cases may arise in which the present condition of business in the Supreme Court and of the judicial business of the country will operate as a practical denial of justice. Causes are tried in the circuit courts of the United States very often by a single judge. In the hurry of a trial before a jury it is almost by a single judge. In the hurry of a trial before a jury it is almost inevitable that errors will occur. Now, sir, suppose that a trial occurs in the city of San Francisco, or in the State of Oregon, involving, if you please, $5,050. That is not a very large sum; but the loss of it by the error or the mistake of the judge may involve financial ruin to a great many litigants. In the haste of the trial of such a case, the litigant has in his opinion been deprived of that sum by the mistake ortheerrorofajudge. Whatis his remedy? An appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; a journey by himself or by his counsel a distance of more than three thousand miles to the city of Washington; a delay of four or five years before a trial can be had. I submit that in such a case there is a practical failure of justice. The expense of prosecuting such a trial is more than the amount in controversy in nine cases out of ten, to say nothing of the delay.

Our present system, then, Mr. Speaker, fails in both these respects. It fails in giving to the litigant a court of appeals within reasonable distance and reasonably convenient to the place where he has his trial in the court below. It fails to give him a speedy final decision. Such is the condition of things to-day, and the evil, the difficulty, is constantly increasing. It seems, therefore, to be entirely clear that some remedy is imperatively demanded. As I have already indicated, the question of what the remedy shall be has been discussed in Congress and in the country. Some ten years ago the matter was discussed at great length in the other branch of Congress. A bill was there pending at that time similar in many of its provisions to the bill now before the House, the principal feature of which was the creation of an intermediate court of appeals to be held in each of the circuits of the United States, to be composed of the justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the circuit, the circuit judge, and the several district judges of the districts composing the circuit. That bill at that time was discussed at great length in the Senate of the United States and by very many of the best lawyers in the country. After an elaborate discussion the bill was passed by a vote I think of about four to one. Among the distinguished lawyers who advocated and supported that bill I find the following: Senator Reverdy Johnson of Maryland, Senator Texture and the United States and the second state of the second ator Trumbull of Illinois, Senator Sumner of Massachusetts, who took a large part in the discussion, Senator Hendricks of Indiana, Senator Guthrie of Kentucky, Senator Howe of Wisconsin, Senator Henderson of Missouri, Senator Harris of New York, who was the author of the bill, Senator Sherman, and others also advocated and voted for it. If gentlemen have the curiosity to look into that debate, they will find it in the fifty-seventh volume of the Congressional Globe, commencing at page 1738. That bill, although it passed the Senate, reached the House at too late a day to be then considered.

I will not detain the House by reading from the debate at any length, but will read a souteness or two from the speech of Senator Hondricks.

but will read a sentence or two from the speech of Senator Hendricks of Indiana. He says:

If we do accomplish what is intended by the bill, that is, to relieve the Supreme Court, so that the cases which come to that court may be decided at an early day, we accomplish what every one admits to be a desirable end, because it is dreadful that people have to wait two or three or four years to have their cases decided. In the mean time estates are tied up, and the gaining party is sometimes destroyed by the very fact of delay. Speedy justice is almost as important as it is to have justice itself.

Now, sir, at that time when this bill was considered and passed by the Senate, and when these remarks fell from the lips of that Senator, the number of cases on the docket of the Supreme Court was little more than four hundred-not half as many as there are upon that

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the proposition to create an intermediate court of appeals must meet with the approval of every gentleman upon this floor. The next question is, How shall this court be composed, and can it be organized without the creation of any additional judges ! It is the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary, their unanimous opinion, that this can be accomplished. I observe, Mr. Speaker, that one of the amendments offered yesterday, I think by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. Reagan,] proposed the creation of two additional judges in each of the circuits to be judges of this court of appeals. If this were really necessary I would not hesitate to advocate it, notwithstanding the general demand that there shall be no increase of expenses and that there shall be no new offices created by this Congress. For I believe, sir, to provide adequate means for the administration of justice in the courts of the country is a matter of such paramount importance that, if it could not be provided with-out the creation of additional judges, I should be in favor of their creation at once. But we believe the court can be created, the duties of which may be discharged by the judicial force which we now have,

of which may be discharged by the judicial force which we now have, and thus save the expense of creating additional judges.

I know, sir, in some of the circuits the calendars are very much crowded, and the labors of the circuit judges are very great. But under the law which provides that a district judge may hold the circuit court, the labors of the circuit judge will be very much reduced under this bill, for we have provided that, wherever a district court is held, a circuit court shall be held at the same time and place, to be held, of course, under the law, in the absence of the circuit judge, by the district judge, precisely as he holds the circuit court now wherever he sits in it, if the other judges are not present.

But moreover, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to another means of relieving the overcrowded dockets of these

The Committee on the Judiciary are of the opinion that the laws with regard to the jurisdiction of the Federal courts need to be some-what changed, and that such changes ought to be made as will reduce very largely the business of those courts. During the last ten or fifteen years Congress has been enacting statutes for the purpose of facilitating the transfer of causes from the State courts to the Federal courts, and the result of these statutes has been the overcrowding of the dockets of the circuit courts in almost every State of the Union. There is no good reason, sir, why the law should not be re-stored practically to its former condition, and measures looking to this will soon be proposed to the House. I may say without impropriety that the Committee on the Judiciary have agreed upon a bill, and intend at the first opportunity to report it to the House, which shall embody three propositions upon this subject. First, that the application for the removal of a cause from a State court to a Federal court shall be made at the time when the party enters his appearance, and that he shall not be permitted, as he is under the existing law, to transfer it at any time before a final judgment. Secondly, that the application for removal shall be made by the defendant and not by the plaintiff, so that if a plaintiff chooses his forum and brings his suit in the State court, he shall not be permitted thereafter to change the forum to a Federal tribunal upon the ground of his non-residence. And, thirdly, that the amount in controversy to permit the removal of a cause from a State court to a Federal court, which is now $500, shall be increased.

If the views of the Committee on the Judiciary upon this subject shall be adopted, it will tend to relieve in a large degree the over-crowded dockets of many of the circuit courts. And again, sir, there are many districts in the United States in which the district judge is not overworked, in which, in point of fact, he is idle a great part of the year. Now the law provides that these district judges may be transferred from one district where they are not engaged to another district where the press of business requires more force, and in this way the dockets of the overcrowded districts may be largely relieved. The difficulty with the law upon this subject as it now stands in all the districts except the district of New York is that there is no provision for paying the expenses of the district judge when he is sent out of his district to hold court elsewhere, and on his inadequate salary he cannot afford to do this duty and pay his own expenses. The Committee on the Judiciary will recommend that this difficulty be remedied. And by a combination of all these means we are entirely satisfied that the intermediate court of appeals which is provided for by this bill the intermediate court of appeals which is provided for by this bill can be constituted from the judges now in office, now provided for by law, without the creation of a single new officer. At all events, sir, we propose to try the experiment. We will inaugurate the right system, and try faithfully to have justice administered under it by our present judicial force. It is certain that more and better work can be done by the present force under this bill than under the present law, and, if the experience of the future shall demonstrate the necessity for more force, it can be supplied by future legislation.

There was an effort made by the last Convress to relieve the Supreme

There was an effort made by the last Congress to relieve the Supreme Court of the United States of its vast accumulation of business. The bill which was then passed for that purpose denies altogether the right of appeal in any case not involving more than $5,000. While in point of fact, Mr. Speaker, this act has not relieved the Supreme Court in any perceptible degree, it has operated, and does operate, as a measure of great injustice. Why, sir, a citizen who litigates in the State courts always has his court of appeal to review the law in the case, I think in every State in the Union, where the matter in controversy exceeds $100, or some such amount as that, but under the existing statute a citizen who is brought into the Federal court can have no appeal either as to the law or the fact unless the amount exceeds $5,000. This was an attempt to relieve the Supreme Court of the United States at the expense of the citizens of the United States, by denying them the right of appeal in a large class of very important cases—a right which they have had from the beginning, and which has always been regarded as a most important and valuable right. I do not hesitate to say that any measure of legislation which proposes to relieve the Supreme Court of the United States from its overwhelming accumulation of business by denying the right of appeal to the citizen in all this large class of important cases will prove entirely unsatisfactory to the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish in conclusion—for I do not intend to de-

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish in conclusion—for I do not intend to detain the House long—to call the attention of the House to the question of expense; a question which I know will interest every gentleman on the floor, and which ought to interest every gentleman on the floor. As I have said, we propose to create no new judgeships. These courts will be held in cities where there are already Federal buildings, and there will be no expense for rents. The marshal of the United States, who has to attend upon these courts will receive his new precisely as who has to attend upon these courts, will receive his pay precisely as he does now: from his fees. The only additional officer created is the clerk of the court, who is paid by fees also and paid by litigant, except his per diem during the time the court is actually in session. It must also be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that the business which is to be transacted by this court of appeals is in large measure business which would otherwise be transacted by the Supreme Court of the United States. Therefore, even if there were expenses attending it, there would be a corresponding saving of expense in the transaction of business in the Supreme Court.

But again, Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, the bill provides for holding the circuit court at the same times and places with the district court. It provides another thing, to which I call the attention of the House as having a bearing upon the question of expense: It provides that but one panel of jurors shall be summoned to serve in both courts when they sit simultaneously, unless, by an order of the judge, made thirty days before the term, a different rule is adopted.

Mr. Speaker, there is no law to-day whereby the same jurors can be summoned to serve both in the district and circuit court, if I may except a provision of the statute which authorizes the circuit court in one district of New York to require jurors summoned to attend the district court to serve also in the circuit court. The expense attending the summoning of jurors to serve in the Federal courts is a very large item of expense. I am unable to state the exact cost to the Government of the United States, but I do not hesitate to say that the sum, if it were ascertained, would be found to be very large. know, at all events, that the jurors who serve in the Federal courts receive $3 per day and five cents a mile as mileage. We know also that not less than sixteen can be summoned to serve as grand jurors, and that the number may be twenty-four. We know that they are brought long distances in many cases, and we know that they remain on duty in many of the courts of the country for a considerable time. Now, sir, if you bring these courts together and require the same jury to serve in both, it will be apparent, I think, to all that there will be a very large saving.

Mr. Speaker, under the laws as they exist to-day the circuit and district courts sit at the same time and place in many of the States. There are fifty-five terms of the district court and fifty-five terms of the circuit court that are held at the same time and place under the law as it is to-day, and yet, sir, separate jurors are summoned for each of these courts. We may make a little calculation, keeping very far within the real sum that is involved under the proposed arrangement, saying nothing about petit jurors—for it may be that separate petit jurors may be required in the two courts; confining ourselves altogether to grand jurors, let us see how the items of expense may be figured: Not less than sixteen grand jurors are to be summoned, and they receive $3 a day and five cents a mile as mileage. Suppose they serve on an average ten days, and each travels fifty miles—that is certainly a very safe calculation—each juror would receive as mileage and per diem for the term $32.50. The number summoned to each court would be sixteen, and to the two courts thirty-two per term. The number summoned to both courts to serve as grand jurors at the fifty-five places where the two courts now sit together would be seventeen hundred and sixty, and their pay at $32.50 each would amount to $57,200 for a single term, and as two terms of each court are held in each year, it would amount to $114,400 per annum. One half of this sum would be saved annually by summoning but one grand jury to serve in both courts.

Now, if you require one grand jury to transact the business for both courts, that is the sum that you will save in these fifty-five places where the courts now sit together. In many of the districts I have no doubt that the same panel of petit jurors could serve in both courts, and they will in all cases, unless the judge for some good reason shall

Now, Mr. Speaker, I'do not desire to detain the House. I am very glad to notice that although a great number of amendments were offered yesterday, all of which I have examined carefully, not one was proposed which seemed to have been proposed in hostility to the principle of this bill, and so far as I know there is no gentleman who proposes to take the floor and contend that some such measure as this is not required by existing circumstances. I must appeal to the House before I take my seat to vote down all the amendments which have been proposed and which involve any material change in the structure of this bill. It is a bill of very great importance. It is one that the Committee on the Judiciary have spent much time in preparing, and concerning which we have consulted many of the ablest lawyers and judges of the country, and which has been perfected, after being redrafted four or five times, as carefully as possible.

There are questions in regard to the places of holding this court of appeals which we are content that the House shall decide. They do not, of course, affect the general principles of the bill. We have selected and recommended such places as we have supposed were the

There is one thing, Mr. Speaker, that I noticed in several of these amendments to which I wish to ask the attention of the House.

There are a number of propositions looking to the holding of this court of appeals at several different places in the same circuit. That, sir, would be entirely impracticable, and would be extremely impoli-tic if it were practicable. The court must be held at a time and at a place when the justices of the Supreme Court can attend it without being absent from the regular session of that court at Washington; it must be held at times and places when the judges of the circuit court can attend it. The moment you depart from the rule that the court can attend it. The moment you depart from the rule that the court shall be held at one place only, you will be pressed to provide for a term in each State of the circuit, and in some of the circuits there are six or seven States. This would destroy the system, for if the courts were thus held the justices of the Supreme Court could not attend it, nor could the circuit judges in many instances. And if you undertake to put the court on wheels and roll it about from place to place, to suit the convenience or the local pride of this city or that, you will destroy the whole system. You want the court at but one place in the circuit; you want its records at but one place; and you want but one time fixed for the meeting of the court, so that the justices of the Supreme Court may attend it.

Without detaining the House further, I return the floor to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. KNOTT,] who will indicate what further action he desires to have taken at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had recommitted to the committee of conference the report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was re-

An act (S. No. 169) giving the consent of the United States to the county of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, to construct county buildings in Washington Square, in the city of Dubuque, and for other

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1798) to re-organize the judiciary of the United States.

Mr. KNOTT. I now yield to my colleague on the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE,] who desires

Mr. LYNDE. I will detain the House but a very few minutes in presenting my views upon this bill. There are certain evils existing in the administration of justice in the courts of the United States at the present time which are well known to the members of the bar who practice in those courts, and which it is very important to remedy. This bill is intended to reach those evils and to provide a remedy for them. The first evil to which my associate on the committee who has just taken his seat [Mr. McCrary] has called the attention of the House is the accumulation of business in the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not care to enlarge upon that point.

The next is the fact that at the present time there is no appeal in civil cases from the decisions of the circuit courts where the judgment is less than $5,000. The law fixing that limit was passed during the last session of Congress. To every practitioner in the circuit courts who knows the manner in which business is disposed of in those courts, this is a great and crying evil. The members of the bar who practice in those courts know very well that our circuit courts, as a general thing, are crowded with business; that the judges who preside in those courts frequently go to the court with a desire to leave at an early day; that they will in some of the places where they hold their court commence at nine o'clock in the morning and hold court until nine or ten o'clock at night. They will hurry through the business, passing upon all the questions that arise in jury cases upon the spur of the moment, and taking the pleadings and arguments presented to them in equity and admiralty cases home with them to be passed upon at their leisure. Yet there is no remedy, when they thus hastily pass upon those cases, as against the errors which may be committed by them.

Now, I care not what may be the learning and ability of the judge, or however honest he may be, however desirous he may be to decide the case correctly; he cannot fail to commit many errors in this hasty trial of cases. Yet, unless the judgment or decree of the court shall exceed the sum of $5,000, under the present law there is no redress to the litigant. This sum of $5,000 is of itself large enough to involve in ruin many of the litigants in these cases. It is time that a remedy should be provided for this evil. This Congress should either limit in ruin many of the litigants in these cases. It is time that a remedy should be provided for this evil. This Congress should either limit the jurisdiction of the United States court in the circuit to an amount exceeding $5,000, or it should provide an appeal from its decisions. I would have no choice; or, rather, I would prefer the former. I would be glad to see the United States court divested of jurisdiction in common law and equity cases of all cases not exceeding $5,000. But I do not suppose there is any probability of getting such a law through this Congress. Therefore, I favor a court of appeals that can hear all cases that are heavily to the United States court whatever may be cases that are brought into the United States court, whatever may be cases that are brought into the United States court, whatever may be the sum that gives that court jurisdiction.

I have called the attention of the House to the existing evil in connection with civil cases. I now wish to call attention to criminal cases. There is now no appeal, there never has been any appeal at all in criminal cases in the United States courts. A party may be tried for his life; his punishment may be imprisonment for life. No matter what the penalty which may be inflicted, up to the present time he has had no appeal, no redress against the errors which may be committed by the court in its rulings upon his case. This is an outrage mitted by the court in its rulings upon his case. This is an outrage. It ought to be remedied, and the bill now before us provides a remedy by giving an appeal in criminal as well as in civil cases as against the errors of the court.

These are the three main features of this bill. I hope that it will receive the approval of this House. These are evils which certainly ought to be remedied. I fancy other bills can be presented that will better meet the necessities of the case. I would cheerfully give it my approval, but, after mature consideration, the Committee on the Judiciary are of the opinion that the plan presented by this bill is the most feasible and the best adapted to meet the demands of the case.

Mr. SAYLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LYNDE. Certainly.

Mr. SAYLER. It is whether the purpose of this bill is not simply to do what we are all the time doing, and what we have been doing. for several years past, to enlarge the authority and jurisdiction of the United States courts and to diminish the authority and jurisdiction of the State courts?

Mr. LYNDE. It is not.

Mr. SAYLER. And whether it would not be better to diminish the authority and jurisdiction of the United States courts instead of increasing them?

creasing them?

Mr. LYNDE. This bill does not enlarge the jurisdiction of the United States courts in a single particular. It only gives redress against the errors committed by the judges of the circuit courts in their hasty disposition of the cases brought before them.

Mr. SAYLER. Then I ask the gentleman whether it does not allow the same judges who sat upon the case below to decide upon their own errors, and whether he has had any experience in courts of that kind? We have had them in Ohio, and I can assure the gentleman that they are very bad courts. I know that as a practicing lawyer.

Mr. LYNDE. This bill provides that the judges who try the cases in the court below shall not sit upon the hearing of the aweal.

in the court below shall not sit upon the hearing of the appeal.

Mr. HUNTON. And shall not be consulted.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And shall not express any opinion.

Mr. SAYLER. But at any rate the system now proposed complicates your appeal; it is certainly no better than the system which we have had of appeals in the original court to a supreme tribunal. Gentlemen are now proposing to apply to the United States courts the same ridiculous system which we have had in the courts of several of the States, including Ohio.

Mr. LYNDE. What would the gentleman do? Would he cut off all right of appeal?

Mr. SAYLER. Not at all. Mr. SAYLER. Not at all.
Mr. LYNDE. What other appeal can he have? As the law now stands he can have no appeal where the judgment does not exceed $5,000. The Constitution gives jurisdiction to the Federal courts. We can only provide the amount required to authorize suit to be brought can only provide the amount required to authorize suit to be brought in those courts. As to the character of the suits, as to the great subjects of jurisdiction, they are fixed in the Constitution itself. But if the gentleman supposes that this bill increases the jurisdiction of the court, he is entirely mistaken. No member upon this floor would go farther than I would to limit the jurisdiction of that court. I know full well the oppression experienced by citizens sued in that court. I know full well that they are frequently brought hundreds of miles with their witnesses to defend their cases where the amount involved is not as great as the expenses they are obliged to incur. I am the last is not as great as the expenses they are obliged to incur. I am the last one who would favor extending that jurisdiction one iota beyond what it is at present. But here is an evil necessary to be removed. We must have a court to correct the errors that are made by judges who dispose of cases hastily on the circuit.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I now call for the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. SAYLER. I move that the bill and amendments be laid on the table. The bill has been so much amended that I think it is a

Mr. KNOTT. I believe the gentleman has not the floor.
Mr. SAYLER. I submit to the Chair whether I have not the right to make that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr.

KNOTT) has the floor.

Mr. SAYLER. I believe I have the right to move that the bill and pending amendments be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor and has moved the previous question.

Mr. SAYLER. And I insist that, pending that motion, I have the right to move that the bill and pending amendments be laid on the table.

to make the motion which he indicates, that the bill and pending amendments be laid upon the table.

Mr. KNOTT. When I have yielded the floor.

Mr. KNOTT. When I have yielded the floor.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has stated that the gentleman from Kentucky was in possession of the floor and had indicated his purpose to move the previous question.

Mr. SAYLER. I understood that the gentleman from Kentucky had made his motion.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Will my colleague [Mr. Knorr] yield for a question? Mr. KNOTT. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Is it too late to offer an amendment to the bill ? If it be in order, I desire to move an amendment as to locality. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kentucky move the previous question?

Mr. KNOTT. Yes, sir; but before the question is taken I desire to say that if the previous question should be sustained, the hour to which I shall be entitled for debate will be allotted to gentlemen who wish to speak upon their amendments.

Mr. SAYLER. Is not my motion now in order?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Is no further amendment to be allowed? The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky has moved the previous question. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] moves that the bill and pending amendments be laid on the table, which motion is in order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. Sayler, there were—ayes 22, noes 81—no quorum voting.

Mr. Sayler. I insist on a further count. If this bill is to pass,

I want to see it passed on a full vote.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SAYLER and Mr. KNOTT were appointed.

The House divided: and the tellers reported—aves 19, noes not counted

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered. So the motion of Mr. SAYLER was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. Mr. KNOTT. In the first place I will call for the reading of the pending amendments.

Mr. SAYLER. Is it in order to recommit the pending bill and amendments? There are so many amendments pending that in my judgment it would be the better course, for we could have the bill brought back to us in proper shape for intelligent action of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is not in possession of the floor, and therefore cannot submit any such motion.

Mr. SAYLER. I would like to ask the Chair who is in possession of it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky, under the rules, the previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered, is entitled to one hour in which to close the de-

Mr. KNOTT. I yield to my colleague a part of my time.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I have not prepared myself to speak in detail upon this bill for the re-organization of the judiciary of the United States, nor indeed did I think it necessary to make any particular preparation for discussion of it, believing, as I do, that the committee to which is given the charge of a particular investigation is most likely to reach a satisfactory conclusion in the report which, when submitted to the House, being right, ought to be sustained. This is a matter which, important in itself, seems to have commanded the entire attention of the Committee on the Judiciary, and to have been reported from that committee almost unanimously. Nevertheless, so captious seem some, that, in opposition to this report, an exception is taken as to a particular place, a place from which I have the honor to come, humble as it may be, and insignificant in the comprehension of the gentlemen from Ohio.

Mr. SAYLER. Does the gentleman refer to me, for I have never made any such remark in connection with his State or city?

Mr. PARSONS. I am not referring to you. If the gentleman wants to hear what I say he can come nearer to me. I believe a gentleman from the State of Ohio occupied the floor in this debate yesterday and took occasion to refer to the city of Louisville and to say that that city was almost insignificant in comparison with Cincinnati and Toledo, and I mean that he so stated in substance.

Mr. SAYLER. Will the geutleman allow me to ask him whether he is able to state emphatically and statistically—
Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman can ask what he pleases, but I do not pledge myself to answer him.

Mr. SAYLER. Well, then, what proportion of business arises in the city of Louisville in comparison with the business which arises in the district of Michigan and Ohio?

the district of Michigan and Ohio?

Mr. PARSONS. If you will ask the gentleman who represents Belle Fontaine about that you may perhaps find out more than I know. [Laughter.] The investigation will be so microscopic it will be almost impossible for me to tell.

Mr. SAYLER. It is not microscopic.

Mr. PARSONS. Well, then the investigation becomes of great importance. It is grand in its proportion. We are nothing at Louisville, in the estimation of some. We have not a local habitation, and there is an attempt made here to take from us even a name. But, sir, we propose, as far as we can, to conserve the habitation and to assert the name. It may be that the city of Cincinnati has a larger population. the name. It may be that the city of Cincinnati has a larger population than the city of Louisville. It may be it has a larger enterprise. I am not here, sir, to take away from the dignity of any city or to destroy its character, or even to attempt to do so. I am surprised, and I say it in sincerity, that any attempt of that sort should have been made here at all upon a bill which met with the approval of the high law committee of the House. I am willing to concede that Cincinnati is a great city. She is a great city. She is a large com-mercial center. She has the best railroads in the country. She has the largest monopolies. She has the best enterprise. In fact, sir, she is the hub of the southern portion of the country. [Laughter.] She has got it all. But let me ask the gentleman from Cincinnati why he is so hoggish about this matter? [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYLER. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether Cincinnati does not pay for her own monopolies?

Mr. PARSONS. I did not hear the question.

Mr. SAYLER. My question was whether Cincinnati does not pay

Mr. SATLER. My diestion was whether Chichman does not pay for her own monopolies?
Mr. PARSONS. Certainly she does.
Mr. SAYLER. And she pays for her own hogs.
Mr. PARSONS. She does, but Louisville pays better, and her bonds to-day in the market stand better than the bonds of Cincinnati.

Mr. SAYLER. I never heard them spoken of as such.
Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I very much regret in this debate upon a bill re-organizing the judiciary questions of revenue should be brought in at all, but the gentlemen have talked about revenue. I am satisfied that the whisky interest is a large one, and demands the attention of courts. But the gentleman who objects on the ground of revenue to the city of Louisville as the proper place to locate a court of appeals happens to forget that that city in itself represents the greatest and most material revenue interest in the country, being the chief tobacco mart of the world.

Mr. SAYLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether it is not a fact

Mr. PARSONS. I beg leave to submit to the gentleman from Ohio that I have but little time and cannot afford to give any of it away. Mr. SAYLER. The gentleman is making a statement in regard to revenue about which he is under a misapprehension; that is the most I will say.

Mr. PARSONS. You mean to say I lie under a mistake. ter.] I will take it in a Pickwickian sense. We can, therefore, furnish to these courts which sit there enough to work upon at least, if we cannot show as much business on which we pay taxes as the gentleman from Ohio demands. I do not see that the revenues of the country have anything to do with the question of the location of the appellate court. The gentleman from Ohio talks about centers, and there is a central idea connected with everything that he has said. I do not understand that any geographical, any mercantile, any revenue, any population center has anything to do with the location of a court. If right in my recollections of the teachings of history, to which I appeal, a court should be removed from all temptations, from all interests, from all revenues, from all gifts. The administration of public justice should be separate and distinct from considerations of property, money, or public enterprises. Corporations have nothing to do with the administration of public justice or the conservation of private rights. Geographical location may be insisted upon as a matter of convenience, simple convenience. That there is a great country and a great people in the north or northwest portion of this circuit is not an argument which should prevail against the bill of this committee which locates this court where it does, at Louisville, insignificant and humble as some may regard it in comparison with other cities.

I say, sir, that I am surprised that the city of Louisville should here be made the subject of attack. Starting out with Porkopolis, they wind up upon Michigan. For fear of misquoting, I shall read from the Record of yesterday's debate. It was marvelous to me, after the ably asserted amendment offered and eloquently maintained by the gentleman from Michigan, that he should take a sudden departure and use his force against Louisville.

and use his force against Louisville

I will read from the remarks of the gentleman:

I do not wish to prolong these remarks. I say in furtherance of what the gentleman from Ohio has said that to compel those two great preponderating States in this district to go any further south than Cincinnati would be a wrong which ought not to be permitted, an expense to litigants, an expense fo attorneys, an expense for witnesses, and for all who might have occasion to go to that court, which ought not to be imposed upon the people of those States. Therefore, while I shall first assent to the change from Louisville to Cincinnati, if that amendment shall fail I shall ask the House to adopt my amendment to transfer the place for the sitting of the court to Chicago.

Now, I would like to ask the gentleman what animosity he has to Louisville, or what preference he has for the city of Cincinnati, that he should urge the transfer first to Cincinnati, and, failing in that, then to the city of Chicago? Is there anything that the city of Louisville has done that should invite the opposition of members of this House? Is there anything she has done which would not entitle her to the respect of all? I do not propose to a tack any locality. Whatever may be said in debate on this floor will not add or detract from the honor and prosperity of either city.

I scarcely believed that it was necessary for me to raise my voice to defend my city from any aspersion; but, as she was attacked, I thought it right to assert her dignity upon this floor. Her business enterprises are greater than those of any city which has been named in connection with this bill. Her taxation is equally great. As revenue upon whiskies and tobacco, she pays one-third of the revenue paid by the whole circuit. The whisky and tobacco in my district pay nearly four millions annually, a revenue from a locality which is sufficient to entitle that locality, upon the idea of the gentleman that revenue and taxation should be the foundation of jurisdiction to a court, not only to a court, but to half a dozen courts, that the administration of public justice may be properly conducted. I sayit again that upon the ground of revenue alone the city of Louisville is entitled, if that be an argument, to rank as one of the largest tax-paying cities in the Union, and to hold her place as contributing more to the properity of the country than any city that has been mentioned in connection with this bill

Is she not near enough to Cincinnati? Are there not railroads that run into Louisville? Have we not railroad connections and facilirun into Louisville? Have we not railroad connect ons and facilities? Have we not the Louisville, Nashville and Great Southern Road? Do we not connect with the whole of the southern territory? Does not our commerce extend itself with almost Briarean arms to embrace the whole South? Are we not in the direct line of your great roads? Have we not a greater concentration of roads, although we may not have quite as many people? Does not considerable traffic pass through Louisville as well as Cincinnati?

So sir L do not conceive that even upon a business ground this

So, sir, I do not conceive that even upon a business ground this matter is to be decided against Louisville. And suppose you take it as a center of population. My recollection is that 'he last census showed the city of Louisville to have one hundred and six thousand inhabitants, and the district in which it is located is one of the most populous and fertile in the country.

As a center of population Cincinnati has no particular advantages over Louisville. The transit is so close that in two hours the differover Louisville. The transit is so close that in two hours the difference of location disappears. Suppose the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Conger] finds it necessary for him to start from his place of residence down to the city of Cincinnati to try a cause. I am speaking now of lawyers. How does he get there? Suppose two men start from his place of residence, one going to the city of Cincinnati and the other to the city of Louisville: the man who starts for Louisville will be there at least four hours sooner than the other who starts for Cincinnati. There is no doubt about the railroad connection.

So then sir I say without detaining the House, that in behalf of

So then, sir, I say, without detaining the House, that in behalf of my city I have lifted my voice and attempted to justify her. As to the rival claimants I have nothing comdemnatory to say, but I still urge as against them that there has been nothing said upon this floor and nothing, as I understand, remaining as a reserved power by the gentleman that can convince me or convince the House that there should be any change in the location of the sixth circuit so far as the appellate court is concerned. I trust, therefore, when the time comes to vote on this amendment, that the House will consider, not only the respect which ought to be given to gentlemen who have carefully entertained, carefully studied, and carefully reported on the subject, but the respect which ought to be given to a great constituency which here demands its rights and asks that they shall be protected.

Mr. KNOTT resumed the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a few words upon this bill.

Mr. KNOTT. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose tomorrow morning. I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.]
Mr. HUNTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 18, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to say to members that in consequence of complaints made of disorder on the right side of the House the Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to order all strangers to the cloak-rooms who have the privilege of the floor, and request members on that side to take their seats. It is utterly impossible to do the public business unless order be maintained.

The Journal was then approved.

PERFORMANCE OF EXECUTIVE DUTIES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following

Mr. BLACKBURN. 1 ask unanimous consent to oner the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform this House, if in his opinion it is not incompatible with the public interest, whether since the 4th day of March, 1869, any executive offices, acts, or duties, and, if any, what, have been performed at a distance from the seat of Government established by law, and for how long a period at any one time, and in what part of the United States; also, whether any public necessity existed for such performance, and, if so, of what character, and how far the performance of such executive offices, acts, or duties at such distances from the seat of Government established by law was in compliance with the act of Congress of the 16th day of July, 1790.

Mr. KASSON. Let that resolution lie over for one day. The season

Mr. KASSON. Det that resolution he over the didd. The season has not arrived to make that inquiry.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] object to the adoption of the resolution by the House?

Mr. KASSON. The resolution lies over one day under the rule in case of objection to its immediate consideration. Besides, this is private-bill day.

ARMY OFFICERS ON DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the resolution which I send to the

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the House whether, since the 20th of March, 1868, any and which officer or officers of the Army have accepted and held any appointment in the diplomatic or consular service and were borne on the Army lists after accepting such appointment, and for how long a time in each case; and whether any officer having held such appointment now holds his rank in the Army and draws the pay thereof, and, if so, by what authority.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object to that resolution.
Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. It will take but a moment.
Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. This is private-bill day, and I call for the regular order. We have but one private-bill day in the week, and I do not want it taken up by other business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCRARY. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This being Friday, the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. McCRARY. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of

Mr. McCRARY. My point of order is this: The previous question having been ordered upon the bill for the re-organization of the judiciary, that is the first business in order this morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order of the House concerning the bill to which the gentleman refers was that it should be the special order on a given day at two o'clock, and from day to day at that hour until disposed of.

Mr. McCRARY. Does the Chair understand that the previous ques-

Mr. McCkari. Does the Chair understand that the previous question was ordered on the bill yesterday?

Mr. HOSKINS. The rule of the House in relation to unfinished business cuts out the morning hour.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Even if that was not the case, the previous question having been ordered on this bill it comes up now for consideration.

Mr. HOSKINS. I refer to Rule 56.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The special order of the House under which the bill referred to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCrary] is considered fixed the hour of two o'clock on a day certain. reads as follows:

The special order for February 16. at two o'clock p. m., and from day to day at the same hour until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other business except regular appropriation bills.

The first impression of the Chair is that the ordering of the previous question upon the pending bill would not hasten its consideration to-day; it would not come up until two o'clock. The Chair, however, would be very glad to be corrected if in error.

Mr. HOSKINS. Will the Speaker indulge me in reading Rule 56?

It is as follows:

The consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment shall be resumed as soon as the Journal of the next day is read, and at the same time each day thereafter until disposed of; and if from any cause other business shall intervene, it shall be resumed as soon as such other business is disposed of.

Of course no other business can intervene except business of a higher order, in which the morning-hour business is not included. I submit that under this rule the unfinished business is not included. I submit that under this rule the unfinished business of yesterday takes precedence of the morning hour. I also submit that such has been the invariable rule and practice of the House ever since I have had a seat on this floor. And the previous question having been ordered on the pending bill, no other business can intervene.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not believe that the rule which has been read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hoskins] compels the House to take up the unfinished business of yesterday before the morning-hour business of to day, because the order of the House making the judiciary bill a special order excluded the morning hour and fixed two o'clock as the time for its consideration. But the pre-and fixed two o'clock as the time for its consideration. But the previous question having been seconded, that brings the bill over as the first business in order after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HOSKINS. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will pardon me for saying that the morning hour was not excluded by the order of the House in reference to the pending bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The time, two o'clock, was fixed, and if the previous question had not been seconded the bill would not come up until that hour is reached.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The special order fixed the consideration of the bill at two o'clock on each day, from day to day, until disposed of. It was the same as if it had read "on Friday, the 18th of February, at two o'clock, it shall be also taken up for consideration." The Chair rules that it does not come up for consideration at this time.

J. M. DORSEY AND W. F. SHEPEARD.

Mr. PAGE. I ask unanimous consent to have Senate bill No. 227, for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William F. Shepeard, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee of Claims.

There was no objection, and accordingly the bill was taken from from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANE. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Indian Affairs a memorial which was improperly referred to that committee, and have it referred to another committee. It is to that committee. It is a memorial of a private nature.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee of the gentleman will be reached to-day under the call. The morning hour now begins at twelve o'clock and twenty-seven minutes p. m., and the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature. The call rested on Friday last with the Committee on Patents.

CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee of Accounts, reported back the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Railways and Canals be authorized to employ a clerk, whose compensation shall be $4 per day.

Mr. FORT. Is this offered for adoption or reference? I move its reference to the Committee of Accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is reported from that committee for adoption.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it in order to-day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Reports of a private nature are in

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a public matter pertaining to the adminis-Mr. HOLMAN. This is a public matter pertaining to the administration of affairs in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the recommendation of the committee?

Mr. POWELL. We report it without recommendation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair rules that this is not a bill of a private nature, but a proposition pertaining to public legislation, and is not in order.

ERROR IN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1668) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act entitled "An act making sundry civil appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876."

The bill was read. It provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling and adjusting the revenue, disbursing, and other accounts of James Atkins, late collector of internal revenue.

nue for the fourth district of Georgia, are hereby directed to credit him with the sum of $14,819.33, on account of loss of that amount by default of deputies in his employ, the amount being lost without neglect or fault of said Atkins.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. This bill involves a considerable amount of money; but after a statement which I desire to make I think the House will be satisfied that the bill ought to pasks on the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to reserve a point of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order will be reserved.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. I wish to make a statement of the facts connected with the omission of the enrollment of this particular item. It was not an error in the enrollment, but a simple omission arising from the confusion incident to the vast number of bills pressed upon the committee at the heel of the session. The facts are these:

The proposed correction is part of a House amendment to an amendment of the Senate to the deficiency bill of the last session, (not the sundry civil bill.) The amendment of the Senate was a paragraph authorizing the sale of Choctaw Indian bonds, and the amendment of the House to the Senate amendment consisted of two items, one of which has already been adopted as a correction in a bill which passed the House January 20. The report of the committee of conference on the deficiency bill recommended that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment referred to, (No. 27 of the Senate,) and it was consequently enrolled as part of the law. The conference report, however, takes notice of the House amendment to the Senate amendment only at its conclusion and in ambiguous language, namely:

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House No. 27.

The House had no amendment so numbered. It was the number of the Senate amendment which the House had amended. It was doubtless the intention of the conference committee to recommend that the Senate agree to the House amendment constituting the two items referred to:

To one not well experienced in enrolling a bill from complicated appears it was a very natural mistake to make under any circumstances, and especially at the last moment of a session, when everything was done hurriedly and amid great confusion. Several large appropriation bills had been divided among all the available clerks, many of whom had been in constant employment for more than thirty consecutive hours; and the wonder is that more errors did not occur under such circumstances. A strict adherence to the sixteenth joint rule would do much to obviate the necessity of correcting "errors in enrollment." That rule provides that—

No bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the three last days of the session.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there a report from the committee on this subject?
Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GAR-FIELD] had charge of the bill, and can explain the matter.
Mr. HOLMAN. I think a report should accompany the bill, unless the gentleman from Ohio remembers the facts.

Mr. GARFIELD. The statements made by the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills are very full and entirely accurate. I remember distinctly that in the last days of the last session a member of the ber distinctly that in the last days of the last session a member of the Committee of Claims asked unanimous consent to offer an amendment on this subject and in these very words. Unanimous consent was given, the gentleman stating that the Committee on Claims were unanimous in favor of the bill which he offered. It was passed here, I think, without a single dissenting vote. When the bill of which it was a part went to the Senate, they non-concurred in gross with all our amendments, and they were sent to a committee of conference, of which I was a member. This specific amendment was read to the committee, was agreed to, and ordered to be embraced in conference report, as we understood and as still amears by the record: and it report, as we understood and as still appears by the record; and it was agreed to in the House. So that this very clause was agreed to by both Houses upon the report of the committee of conference.

In consequence of the hurried manner in which the amendments were adopted it became necessary, in order to enroll the bill on parch-ment, to take it apart and enroll it in sheets, there being eight or ten ment, to take it apart and enroll it in sheets, there being eight or ten clerks at work upon the bill, each enrolling a separate sheet, the whole being afterward stitched together. After the bill was sent to the President it was discovered that one of those sheets had been left lying on the desk in the enrolling-room, so that not a word of it had gone into the bill. Fortunately for the remaining provisions of the bill there was no broken paragraph in consequence of the omission. That sheet contained two items only, this one and another, the omission of which was corrected about a month ago upon the report of the Enrolling Committee, which has now become a law. The remainder of the sheet contained the words embraced in the bill now reported. Of course it is a matter of good faith to all concerned that reported. Of course it is a matter of good faith to all concerned that reported. Of course it is a matter of good faith to all concerned that this bill should now be passed to correct that mistake in enrollment. I will add that I saw every step in the progress of this measure; and I supposed it was contained in the bill as approved and signed until the next day, when, my attention being called to the matter, I ascertained at the President's that it was not in the bill, and coming back to the House, found the missing sheet still lying in the engrossing clerk's room, there having been this mere accidental omission of the two items contained on that sheet.

Mr. HOLMAN. If this were an original measure, I should have to insist upon the point of order; but upon the statement made, inasmuch as the object of the bill is simply to correct an error in the enrollment of a bill passed at the last session, it is manifestly proper that the correction should be made. Therefore I do not insist on the

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read

the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE H. FAIRFIELD.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 408) to authorize George H. Fairfield to file petition in the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, have directed me to report the same back as improperly referred, and to move that they be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BRIGHT also, from the Committee of Claims, moved that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the following cases: and the same were referred to the Committee on War Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 1967) for the relief of Robert B. Smock, of Central Colorado, for the boarding of recruits for the United States military service;

A bill (H. R. No. 1725) for the relief of Josiah Cunningham;
A bill (H. R. No. 1727) for the relief of Jacob Bogert, now of the city of New York;
A bill (H. R. No. 1856) for the relief of James W. Bowen, provost-marshal of the (late) tenth congressional district of Pennsylvania;
A bill (H. R. No. 1941) to allow David A. Martin to appear before

A bill (H. R. No. 1941) to anow have A. Martin to appear before the Court of Claims, as therein provided; A bill (H. R. No. 1954 for the relief of Charles Thimons, late mate of the steamer New Iago; and A bill (H. R. No. 1928) for the relief of Elias B. Moore.

JOHN T. BRISTOW.

Mr. TARBOX, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report on the petition of John T. Bristow, asking the fine imposed upon him by the United States district court at Baltimore, Maryland, for an alleged assault on a letter-carrier be refunded; and the same was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS CEDED BY TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. TARBOX also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 186) to provide for compensation to the owners of certain lands ceded by the United States to Great Britain in and by the treaty of Washington of July 9, 1842, with amendments; which were re-ferred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LOUIS GOODWIN.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2160) for the relief of Louis Goodwiu, late keeper of the light-vessel at Brant Island Shoal, in the State of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM HARVEY.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee of Claims to report back the petition of William Harvey, and to ask for information as to the proper committee to which it should be referred. The indorsement upon the petition is of such a character that the precise nature of the claim cannot be ascertained. I ask the petition be read by the Clerk, so the House may judge precisely the title and referred to the proper committee. cisely what it is and refer it to the proper committee.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the petition, when the following proceedings occurred:

Mr. GOODIN. I ask the Speaker whether it would not be in order to move to suspend the further reading of this ridiculous petition? Enough has been read to show its character, and, if in order, I will move that it be laid on the table, where it properly belongs.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I hope that will not be done, but that the petition will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, for every section of the country seems to look to that for relief from every imaginary evil. It is just as sane as one-half of those referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object to the suspension of the reading of the petition and that it be laid on the table?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I do not object to dispensing with the reading of the petition, but I wanted it referred with other memorials of crazy people to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask that the petition be not incorporated in the RECORD. It would be improper to encumber the RECORD with a paper of this kind. I suppose under the rule it would go into the RECORD, at least as much of it as has been read, unless the House otherwise orders.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York insist on his motion to send the petition to a committee in Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I do not.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask that by unanimous consent the petition be not printed in the RECORD. Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I do not desire to have the petition go into the RECORD, and I have no objection to its lying on the table.

The Committee of Claims merely desire to get rid of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made. The Chair hears none. The petition will lie on the table, and will not be printed in the RECORD.

SECURITIES OF G. R. HORTON.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 545) for the relief of James A. Jackson and other securities of G. R. Horton, late postmaster at Monticello, Arkansas; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PEASLEY & M'CLARY.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, also, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the bill (S. No. 191) for the relief of Peasley & McClary, of Nashua, New Hampshire, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF SAMUEL RHEA,

Mr. CAULFIELD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 912) to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of the heirs of Samuel Rhea.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Court of Claims to investigate the claim of the heirs of Samuel Rhea for the net proceeds of cotton owned jointly by the said Rhea and one John H. Fain; and if said court shall be satisfied from the evidence of the ownership of the said Rhea in said cotton, and that the same was seized and sold, and the proceeds thereof have been paid into the Treasury of the United States, to award to his said heirs the net proceeds thereof as determined by the said court in the case of John H. Fain, heretofore determined in said court; and the evidence heretofore taken in the said suit of John H. Fain may be offered by either party.

The amendments of the committee were to strike out the word "heirs" wherever it occurs and to insert in lieu thereof the words "legal representatives."

Mr. MORRISON. I make the point of order that this bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I do not agree with my colleague. This is not a bill for the payment of money. It is simply a bill to allow the legal representatives of a person by the name of Rhea, whose cotton was sold and the money for which is now in the Treasury of the United States, to a sert their claim before the Court of Claims. There is no appropriation of money whatever.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been held I think uniformly that where the legitimate result of a bill is an appropriation of money out of the Treasury, as for instance the creation of an office, such a bill comes within the rule. And it has been held that where a bill authorizes a party to go to the Court of Claims it comes within the rule. I think such was the ruling of the Chair upon the bill for the relief of Mr. Douglas and others in the last session of Congress. This bill authorizes the parties to go into the Court of Claims to prosecute a claim against the Government, and inasmuch as any judgment rendered by that court must be provided for by Congress, it seems clearly to me within the rule. And I believe that has been the uniform ruling of

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot understand that the rule suggested by the that a bill allowing one to go into the Court of Claims to assert a claim is an appropriation, and must therefore go to the Committee of the Whole, a bill authorizing a person to bring a suit of any kind in any other court would have to go to the Committee of the Whole as any other court would have to go to the Committee of the Whole as a bill making an appropriation. It certainly cannot be true that giving jurisdiction to a court to try a claim is a law appropriating money. Such a bill as this only authorizes the determination of the questions of law and fact as to whether the person be entitled to money. The money that may be drawn under this act as I understand it—and I just caught casually what was going on—is money now held by the Government in trust for the benefit of those who can make good their title to it, and is already appropriated as a trust fund in the hands of the Government to pay these claims when the claimants make good their title to it. If that be so, sir, then the money is appropriated; it is a trust fund; not money in the Treasury for any general purpose whatever, but a trust fund, which cannot be used for any other purpose until there be some legislative action on it.

It seems clear to me that it would be a strange construction of the rules of the House to assume that a bill which simply gives a court authority to try the question whether a person is or is not entitled to money is to be considered as a bill appropriating money.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of Rule 112.

The Clerk read the one hundred and twelfth rule, as follows:

All proceedings touching appropriations of money and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say, the rule having been read, that this bill does not appropriate money or authorize the payment of money at all, but simply gives jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to determine the question whether this money should be paid or not.

Mr. HOLMAN. The ground on which the Chair has uniformly held that such bills as this are subject to the rule is that a judgment of the Court of Claims against the Government must be provided for by an appropriation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no difficulty about this question. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Morrison] has raised the point of order that this bill must have its first consideration in a Committee of the Whole House. The Chair sustains the point of order, both upon the interpretration of the rule by the present occupant of the chair and that given to it by previous occupants of the

Mr. CAULFIELD. Very well; let it go.
The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MRS. SARAH SPAULDING.

Mr. CROUNSE, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 566) granting relief to Mrs. Sarah Spaulding, of Bay City, Michigan; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

A. W. HICKS.

On motion of Mr. EDEN, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 450) for the relief of A. W. Hicks, of Ohio, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

THOMAS ALCOCK.

On motion of Mr. EDEN, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 703) granting a pension to Thomas Alcock, of Rochester, New York, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ORDER IN THE HALL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Business will be suspended until order is restored in the Hall. The Chair is informed by the Doorkeeper that the disturbance comes from members of the House who are not in their seats. Gentlemen will please be seated and preserve order.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SAINT ALBANS.

Mr. EDEN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (8. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albans, in the county of Franklin, in the State of Vermont, the value of certain Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agents of the United States, and forcibly taken from them by raiders from Canada in October, 1864, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. EDEN also, from the same committee, reported, a substitute for the House bill No. 1218, making appropriation for the payment of claims reported to Congress under section 2 of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1874, by the Secretary of the Treasury, and for approved June 16, 1874, by the Secretary of the Treasury, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. EDEN. I will state that the appropriation provided for in this bill embraces claims reported by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 31st of December, 1874. A bill was passed at the last session of the Forty-third Congress making an appropriation covering these claims. It failed to pass the Senate, not having reached there in time. As the bill embraces numerous items and the appropriation amounts to about $112,000, I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

R. H. BUCKNER.

Mr. ELLIS, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 753, a bill (H. R. No. 2161) for the relief of R. H. Buckner; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report ordered

CLAIMANTS OF LANDS IN TERRITORIES.

On motion of Mr. KETCHUM, the Committee on Private Land Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1021) enabling claimants to lands within the limits of the Territories of New Mexico, Colorado, and Arizona to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF SAMUEL WARE.

Mr. POWELL, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 97) directing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue certificates of relocation for six hundred and forty acres of land in the Territory of Missouri to the legal representatives of Samuel Ware; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report ordered to be printed.

C. H. FREDERICK.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (8. No. 416) for the relief of C. H. Frederick, late lieutenant-colonel Ninth Missouri Infantry; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report ordered to be printed.

FRANK SIPPELIUS.

Mr. TERRY, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 714) for the relief of Frank Sippelius, late first lieutenant, Sixty-eighth Regiment of New York Volunteers; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADOLPH JOSEPH.

Mr. TERRY also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 712) for the relief of Adolph Joseph, late first lieutenant of the Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MORRIS GASNELL.

Mr. TERRY also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 763) for the relief of Morris Gasnell; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

J. T. MORRIS.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1411) for the relief of J. T. Morris, of Petersburgh, Virginia, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF CADET RIFLES.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 683) to authorize the sale of cadet rifles.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to sell to C. B. Metcalf, of Worcester, Massachusetts, for the use of the Highland Military Academy, at what he shall deem a fair price, eighty cadet breechloading rifles, if, in his judgment, the same can be properly spared, and to cover the proceeds into the Treasury.

The amendment was read. It was to make the latter part of the bill read as follows:

—at cost, the price received for the same to be covered into the Treasury, subject to the order of the Secretary of War, to be used in the manufacture of an equal number of arms to replace them.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARGARET L. STEVENS.

Mr. LANE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the memorial of Mrs. Margaret L. Stevens, widow of General Isaac I. Stevens, for compensation for services as superintendent of Indian affairs, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

AARON BUCHANAN.

Mr. YEATES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1656) granting a pension to Aaron Buchauan, Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry, Company C; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN M. ENGLISH.

Mr. YEATES, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) in favor of John M. English, of North Carolina.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution instructs the Secretary of the Interior to direct the pension agent at Raleigh, North Carolina, to issue duplicate check No. 8424 for $1,334, in favor of John M. English, for one lost in the mail on May 18, 1875.

Mr. YEATES. This joint resolution is not to appropriate any money from the Treasury, for the money has already been appropriated. It is to replace a check which was issued last May and has never yet been heard from. It appears from the testimony that Charles H. Beverly, the pension agent at Raleigh, sent by mail last May a check to the applicant. The applicant certifies that he never has received the check, and the cashier of the bank upon which the check was drawn certifies that it has never been paid.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I presume there will be no objection whatever to the passage of this resolution. Section 4770 of the Revised Statutes provides that where checks are lost for the payment of pensions duplicates may be issued, except in cases where the check is for a greater sum than $500. This check was issued in May last and lost while passing through the mails. We have on file the affidavit of the postmaster that no such letter or check was received; also the affidavit of the soldier himself to that effect, the affidavit of the the amdavit of the soldier himself to that effect, the amdavit of the pension agent, Mr. Beverly, of Raleigh, North Carolina, that the check was sent, and the affidavit of the cashier of the bank that the check has never been paid. The proof is clear that the check is lost, and it is necessary that Congress shall authorize the issue of a duplicate check in order that the soldier may receive his pension.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman read the section of the Revised Statutes to which he refers?

Mr. WANCE of North Corpline. Lock the Clerk to read section.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I ask the Clerk to read section 4770 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

In place of original checks issued for pensions, when lost, stolen, or destroyed, disbursing officers and agents of the United States are authorized, after the expiration of six months from the date of such checks, to issue duplicate checks, and the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, and designated depositaries of the United States are directed to pay such checks, drawn in pursuance of law by such officers or agents, upon notice and proof of the loss of the original checks, under such regulations in regard to their issue and payment, and upon the execution of such bonds, with sureties, to indemnify the United States, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. But this section shall not apply to any check exceeding in amount the sum of $500.

Mr. HOLMAN. The provisions of the section of the Revised Statutes just read are certainly very just; but the pending joint resolution does not go to the extent required; it does not provide any indemnity to the Government against loss which might result from the payment of the duplicate check and the ultimate payment of the original check. I think there should be added a provision to this joint resolution requiring the execution of the bond of indemnity contemplated in section 4770 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I do not think the reasoning of my friend is good, because the section just read provides that the check cannot be re-issued after the expiration of six months. Therefore, if the original check was presented at the Bank of Raleigh, it would not the original check was presented at the Bank of Raleigh, it would not be paid because it is debarred by the statute. I think that to adopt such an amendment as the gentleman proposes would be requiring a good deal at the hands of this soldier, a poor man perhaps. I do not know whether he could give the bond. I doubt it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will perceive that where the amount is even less than $500 it has been thought prudent to require an independent poor.

amount is even less than $5000 it has been thought prudent to require an indemnifying bond. If it has been thought proper to make such a general provision of law in regard to smaller sums, it certainly would be proper where this larger sum is to be paid. All I ask is that the same rule which would apply to the issuing of a duplicate for a smaller sum shall apply to issuing this duplicate. I trust the gentleman will see the propriety of adding simply these words: "Upon the execution of an indemnifying bond as contemplated by section 1470 of the Revised Statutes."

Mr YEATES, If I understand this matter, my friend from Indiana.

Mr. YEATES. If I understand this matter, my friend from Indiana is entirely mistaken. Here is a law naming a certain time after which the check cannot be paid, but is barred by the statute of limitations. Besides, here is the certificate of the cashier of the bank, with due notice of the loss of that check.

As my friend and colleague [Mr. Vance, of North Carolina] has said, the requirement proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] would be very hard upon this poor man. The soldiers that I have usually associated with were generally poor men; and this is especially true of the privates in the ranks, of whom this man is one. He has been without his money since the end of the war. Is it not time that justice should be done to him? Shall we now impose upon him this hardship by requiring him to give a bond of $1,300, when he is a poor man and probably cannot give that bond to save his life? Such a requirement is not right.

Mr. PAGE. Are we to understand the gentleman as saying that the original critificate is barred by the statute of limitations?

Mr. YEATES. Yes, sir. The original check, I say, is barred by the

Mr. YEATES. Yes, sir. The original check, I say, is barred by the statute of limitations; and therefore there is certainly no necessity for imposing this severe requirement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to see the statute creating the bar. This statute certainly does not. I think there must be a misapprehension on that point. The bona fide holder of the original check can of course draw the money. The object of this statute was simply to protect the Government from paying the amount twice. The original draft may go into the hands of a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration. The duplicate is paid. There is no bar. My friend from North Carolina must have observed that. The original may be presented at the Treasury any time for payment. Our statute cannot presented at the Treasury any time for payment. Our stante cannot impose a limitation upon the time within which the original draft may be presented for payment to the proper officer of the Treasury. It is only because I wish to protect the Government from the liability of paying the debt twice that I make my suggestion. I move to amend by adding the following words: Provided. That a proper indemnifying bond be executed in conformity with section 1470 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. YEATES. I hope gentlemen will remember that this is a poor man, not able to give a bond, and that there is no doubt about the justice of his claim. No one will deny that he is entitled to this money. Why, then, should the House clog the bill with this severe imposition with which it will be impossible for him to comply? My colleague or perhaps myself might be able to give such a bond; but colleague or perhaps myself might be able to give such a bond; but this is a poor, humble man, with no means of getting a living except this pension. And I tell the gentleman that the statute does bar the original check. The bank has had due notice of its loss; the time allowed for its payment has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. By what statute?

Mr. YEATES. By the statute which fixes the time within which the man shall prosecute and collect his claim.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no; my friend misapprehends the statute. This law provides simply for issuing a duplicate after six months have expired, because if the draft is not presented within six months it may be fairly presumed that it has been lost. I think that such an amendment as I propose should be adopted.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. In reply to my friend from Indiana, I wish to say that I can see no possibility of the Government ana, I wish to say that I can see no possibility of the Government paying this debt twice, because the bank at Raleigh, North Carolina, has been notified that the check is lost. I believe there is another statute (though I cannot at this time give a particular reference to it) which prevents the payment of these checks after ninety days from the time they are issued. I think that when a check has been out in the mails ninety days it becomes dead and cannot be paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there is such a statute as that, of course I yield the point at once. But my friend must see that this statute is an ab-the point at once. But my friend must see that this statute is an absurdity if that is the law.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I hope the House will not impose upon this soldier the burden of giving a bond for this lost check. The proof is made here that the check was never received. The soldier has been recognized as a man who served his country. He has been placed upon the pension-rolls, which I think is right. He is a poor man and has not received his money, but has been kept out of it for nearly twelve months. He cannot give a bond. I hope the House will not impose upon him any such burden.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am desirous that this money shall be paid; but does my friend propose to repeal this statute? Does he think it ought not to be applied to the case now pending? All I ask is that the Government shall be indemnified from paying this debt a second time. If my friend's view of the law is correct that a draft on the Treasury ernment shall be indemnified from paying this debt a second time. If my friend's view of the law is correct that a draft on the Treasury cannot be paid after ninety days, then his conclusions are inevitable. But he will find that not to be the statute. The time is indefinite when a draft may be presented. The original draft may be presented at any time if held by a bona fide holder. Without wishing to embarrass in the slightest degree this measure, I only insist that the general law is right and should be applied to this case.

The question recurred on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment.

Mr. YEATES. I hope the members will remember that this is a

Mr. YEATES. I hope the members will remember that this is a poor invalid soldier who cannot give any such bond as is required by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The House divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 129.
So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAINEY. I move the following amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be satisfied the same has never been

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I have no objection to it. Mr. YEATES. The committee are willing to accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YEATES. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was according read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution, as amended, was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the following cases; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions:

The bill (H. R. No. 1230) supplementary to the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871; and The petition asking that a pension be granted to Hiram Matthews, of Mooresville, Indiana, who served as a soldier of the war of 1812.

JAMES RILEY.

Mr. RICE, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1179) granting a pension to James Riley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM J. DRAKE.

Mr. RICE also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1189) granting a pension to William J. Drake; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CLARA BROSCH.

Mr. BAGBY, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2162) granting a pension to Clara Brosch, mother of Joseph Brosch, jr., late of Company H, Twenty-fourth Regiment, Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH B. THOMAS.

Mr. RAINEY, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2163) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Thomas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R No. 240) granting a pension to John A. Goedfrey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF NAME OF SCHOONER.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1384) to change the name of the schooner Turner & Keller, of Oswego, New York, to that of Falmouth, and moved that it be put on its passage.

The bill, which was read, provides that the owners of the schooner Turner & Keller, of Oswego, New York, have authority to change the name of said schooner to Falmouth, by which name said schooner shall hereafter be known and registered.

Mr. DUNNELL. The change of name desired is because of the existence of another schooner sailing from the same port of Oswego of the same name, the two schooners being of the same tonnage and built in Wisconsin by the same builder, this similarity of name and build producing confusion in the business transacted by the two. There was no objection to the bill in the Committee on Commerce.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ssed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

BIRTHDAY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. CASON. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That for the promotion of national feeling throughout the Union on the occasion of the centennial year of our Independence, and believing this to be the proper time for the expression of our appreciation of the great services rendered to the people and the cause of liberty by the Father of our Country, George Washington, the 22d day of the present month shall be treated and deemed a national holiday throughout the United States in the Government business, and, so far as is consistent with the public welfare, in all of the departments of the Government employment shall be suspended for that day.

Mr. CASON. I ask the previous question on the resolution. I do not think it necessary to say anything in support of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the resolution be again reported.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the resolution be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CASON.] Is not the 22d of February a public holiday already by force of law?

Mr. CASON. I do not understand that it is. There is no statute making the 22d of February a holiday. At least I have been unable to find any such provision in the statute-book. There is no authority under which the Departments can alone on that does under which the Departments can close on that day.

Mr. BLAND. Is this intended to apply to the centennial year alone?

Mr. CASON. It is for this year alone.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered;

which was on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BLAND. I call for the reading of the resolution.

Mr. PAGE. I object. It has been read twice.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to say one word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order, the main question having been ordered.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I just wish to make one remark. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Did the gentleman vote with the prevailing side?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There is no record of how we voted.

I wish to say that the pay of some of the clerks in the Departments ceases unless they are at work every day, and this resolution as it stands would make it hard instead of easy for some of those poor clerks. You ought so to amend this resolution that during this day set apart as a holiday the pay shall continue. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The question being taken on the concurrent resolution, it was adopted.

Mr. CASON moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The lafter motion was agreed to.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the regular order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1798) re-organizing the judiciary of the United States, and amendments, on which the previous question has been ordered. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] is entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] will please take the chair during the Mr. KNOTT. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Banning.]

Mr. BANNING. I do not propose to say anything as to the general provisions of the bill. They have been already well argued by more capable gentlemen than myself. But I do wish to say a word to this House upon the place where this court created by the bill is located in the sixth judicial circuit. For some reason, which I cannot understand, the bill locates this court at the city of Louisville, in the south-

ern part of the circuit.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the courts in these circuits should be located as near as possible to the geographical centers, taking into consideration the business that will come to the courts from the circuit and the population of the circuit. Now, Mr. Speaker, I find on examination that the population of this circuit is as follows: That in Ohio there are 2,665,260; in Michigan 1,187,234; making 3,852,494. Of the two Southern States, Kentucky has 1,321,000, Tennessee 1,258,000, making 2,579,000 south of the southern boundary of Ohio. About one third of the population is souther the southern boundary of Ohio. one-third of the population is south of the southern boundary of Ohio, and the court is located at Louisville, about one hundred and thirty miles south of that boundary.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another and far more potent reason than

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another and far more potent reason than the one I have given why this court should not be located at Louisville, but should be located farther north and at Cincinnati. It is this: The business that will come to this court will be principally admiralty business and the business that grows out of the internal-revenue taxes collected in the circuit. I think I may safely say that nine-tenths of the admiralty business will come from north of the southern boundary of Ohio, from Lake Michigan and Lake Erie. An examination further shows that the internal revenue collected in this circuit is largely collected in the two northern States—

[Here the hommer fell 1]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BANNING. I desire just one moment more.

Mr. KNOTT. I cannot yield further to the gentleman. I have agreed to give three minutes to his colleague from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER.]

Mr. BANNING. I hope I will be allowed to make a statement as to the internal revenue collected in this circuit. I ask the House to yield me one minute to state that which has so important a bearing in reference to the location of the court.

Mr. KNOTT. I yield the gentleman another minute.
Mr. BANNING. I thank the gentleman. There are twenty-four millions of revenue collected in this circuit. Of those twenty-four millions, sixteen millions are collected north of the Ohio River, north of the southern boundary of Ohio-more than two-thirds of the entire internal revenue collected in the circuit out of which grows a large amount of the business that will be brought to this court.

Now I ask the House, under these circumstances, would it be just, would it be right, to carry all this business one hundred and thirty miles south of where it is created and grows up, and south of the geographical center, merely for the accommodation of Louisville, especially when it is remembered that Cincinnati herself pays nine millions, or more than one-third of the entire revenue of the circuit, is about the geographical center, the most accessible and convenient point in the circuit, and has the best of accomodations for the court and its officers?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The extension of the gentleman's time for one minute has expired.

Mr. BANNING. I think, Mr. Speaker, that, notwithstanding the fact that Louisville is a good town and her people good people, the House will consider this question, decide justly, and locate this court where every argument proves and reason teaches it should be located, at Cincinnati.

Mr. KNOTT. [Mr. SAYLER.] I yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio,

Mr. SAYLER. I do not propose, of course, in two minutes to discuss any question so important as this. I have a great notion not to take two minutes if I cannot get more than two minutes.

Mr. KNOTT. It is all you asked for.

Mr. SAYLER. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill ought not to pass. It

Mr. SAYLER. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill ought not to pass. It simply complicates our system of appeals and ingrafts upon the United States courts the bad system we have had for some time in Ohio, but from which, I congratulate the chairman of the committee, they have been free in Kentucky. It complicates the whole system of courts. It is a very good thing for lawyers, of whom I am one, and it is a very bad thing for clients, and it keeps every man out of the Supreme Court of the United States who has not a cause that amounts to the dignity of $10,000. I think therefore the bill ought not to pass. I made a motion last night in good faith to lay it on the table in consideration of its merits, and not from any opposition to Louisville.

Now, if I have half a minute left, I want to convince the House of this fact, that it is a very great wrong to the sixth circuit to transfer the court of appeals, if it is to be established, to a city entirely outside of the center of business. There was a great deal of good sense in the speech which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Conger] made the other day, in which he asked, if the court of appeals was to be put in Louisville, to have his district placed in the seventh circuit. The statistics that I hold in my hand show that nine-tenths of all the business in this circuit is north of the Ohio River.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KNOTT. Inasmuch as the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] imply a reflection upon me for limiting him to two minutes, I desire to say to the House that that was all the time the gentleman asked for. At the time he made the request if he had asked for more time I would very cheerfully have given it to him, and to my mind it seems a little ungracious for him to make the insinuation, for I have extended to him all the courtesy which he asked. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I regard the construction of the fifth circuit as a very unfortunate one for the interest of suitors and for the convenience of the Government and courts. If it were posfor the convenience of the Government and courts. If it were possible to re-adjust the circuits, now it ought to be done. Still they exist already in the same geographical form as is proposed in this bill, and therefore I am not complaining of the gentleman in charge of the bill for the shape of the circuits. If gentlemen will think for one moment on the shape of this fifth circuit, that it reaches from the Canada line, far up in the Northwest on Lake Superior, to Chattanooga, near the Georgia line, and if they will reflect that by the ordinary routes of travel it requires more than two thousand miles of travel to get from one end of the circuit to the other they will see of travel to get from one end of the circuit to the other, they will see how difficult it is to manage such a circuit and do justice to the parties whose interests are concerned.

Now this circuit embraces two districts in Tennessee, one in Kentucky, two in Ohio, and two in Michigan, and it is proposed to put the headquarters of this great circuit at the city of Louisville, which is very nearly sixteen hundred miles from the northern end of the circuit. Those who live on the upper peninsula of Michigan, and need to go down to this appellate court, will be compelled to travel sixteen hundred miles to reach that place.

Now, we have heard the population stated; we have heard the amount of revenue collected; we have heard the square miles of terbusiness of the court. By turning to the report of the Attorney-General of this year, (pages 23 and 27,) and leaving out of the court for the time being suits in which the United States were a party—because that would not be so important in relation to the business of the court -but taking only the causes decided last year in which private parties were interested, we find that there were 1,151 causes decided in the district courts of this circuit during the year ending June 30, 1875. Of those 1,151 causes, 250 were in the two districts of Tennessee, 25 of them in Kentucky, making 275, and 427 of them were in the two districts of Michigan.

Mr. PARSONS. May I ask the gentleman a question as a lawyer?

Mr. PARSONS. May I ask the gentleman a question as a lawyer?
Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, if the gentleman will make it a question only, for my time is short.

Mr. PARSONS. Yes, sir; I will do so. Is it not the best indication for any district or section for an application for a court made that it has less litigation than other sections; that the court itself will suppress litigation? Is it not the policy of the law to stop litigation?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have always thought not. In other words, they ask us to put the headquarters of this court at a point where during the last year less than one-fourth of all the business of the circuit was transacted. I see from the figures before me that there were considerably more causes settled in the two districts of Michigan than in the whole of Tennessee and Kentucky together. I speak only of causes in which private citizens are concerned.

Now, how is it as to causes entered during the year? There were 3.875 causes entered of record in the district courts in this circuit. They were distributed as follows: 336 in Kentucky, 382 in Tennessee, 1,617 in Michigan alone, and 600 in the districts of Ohio, making more than three-fourths of all the entries of causes in that circuit above the line of Columbus.

Well, now, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly clear to my mind that in view of these facts this House ought not to locate this court of appeals of this circuit so far south as Louisville. I rise, therefore, to support the amendment of my colleague from the Cleveland district, [Mr. Payne,] in which he proposes we shall have the court of this extremely long district meet successively in the cities of Louisville, Cincinnati, and Cleveland.

That has been tried in Pennsylvania. The supreme court of Pennsylvania holds its sessions part of the year in Pittsburgh, also I think in Harrisburgh, and I know it holds them in Philadelphia and Williamsport. They have found not only no serious inconvenience from having their court of appellate jurisdiction held at different points within the State, but a great benefit to the business of the State.

Mr. DURHAM. What is the difference in the distance between the upper peninsula of Michigan to Louisville and to Cincinnati? mean directly by rail.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is a hundred and odd miles; I do not remember the exact distance.

Mr. DURHAM. A hundred and odd miles out of sixteen hundred.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes.

Mr. DURHAM. Allow me to ask another question. Where do you hold your superior court of Ohio, in Cincinnati or in Columbus?

Mr. GARFIELD. The State court, do you mean?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes.

Mr. GARFIELD. At Columbus. Mr. DURHAM. Then you do not locate it in the city where the

Mr. DURHAM. Then you do not locate it in the city where the bulk of the business is?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose the gentleman is aware that where we have a city midway between the two chief cities of the State, it is very convenient, in a State as well provided with railroads as Ohio, to have the court held at the capital. But I say I see no serious objection whatever to having this court held at three different points successively, as proposed by my colleague, [Mr. PAYNE,] so as to be convenient to all portions of the district, or as convenient as it can be made. I believe the court in that circuit was not taken to Louis. be made. I believe the court in that circuit was not taken to Louisbe made. I believe the court in that circuit was not taken to Louis-ville because of our great respect for the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. KNOTT,] although I think it would take the court almost anywhere he might desire. I think it was because of the form of the bill introduced years ago by the late Senator Harris, of New York, who drafted it without much reference to geographical considerations. The question has not been considered by the House where the headquarters of the circuit ought to be. I hope the amendment of my colleague [Mr. PAYNE] will be adopted and allow the court to be held at the three points named by him.

Mr. KNOTT resumed the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to say—

Mr. KNOTT. I have yielded so much of my time that I have none left to yield to my colleague.

Mr. KNOTT. I have yielded so much of my time that I have hone left to yield to my colleague.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Well I will say this anyway.

Mr. KNOTT. Say it, then.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I hope gentlemen will consent to compromise this matter by adopting Covington instead of Louisville.

Mr. KNOTT. I propose to occupy the time I have reserved for myself simply in recapitulation of certain facts which I wish every general simply in recapitulation of certain facts which I wish every general.

self simply in recapitulation of certain facts which I wish every gentleman to distinctly bear in mind when he comes to vote upon this bill, leaving those facts to carry their argument with them.

In the first place I desire to state that this bill does not enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts; it does not authorize a solitary suit to be instituted in any Federal court that is not now authorized by law to be so instituted. It will facilitate the administration of justice in the lower courts by relieving the dockets of the circuit courts of a vast number of cases upon appeal with which those dockets in many States are at present overburdened, while it affords litigants in the circuit courts an opportunity to have their cases tried and determined at places more convenient to their residences.

It proposes to allow litigants in the circuit courts an opportunity to have judgments against them reviewed by a competent appellate tribunal upon appeal or writ of error, in all cases where the amount involved exceeds $500; whereas that right is totally denied under the law as it now exists unless the amount involved exceeds $5,000. It proposes to allow a writ of error as a matter of right in every criminal case tried in any Federal court; whereas under existing laws that right is now denied.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to inquire whether or not this bill requires appellants in criminal cases to give security for the costs of the appeal?

Mr. KNOTT. It does not. This bill will tend to diminish the number of cases on the docket of the Supreme Court of the United States and thus enable that court to determine such cases as may be brought before it with proper deliberation and reasonable dispatch, instead of requiring the litigant to wait, as he is now compelled to do, for the requiring the litigant to wait, as he is now compelled to do, for the determination of his case from three to five years. At the same time it allows every judgment involving more than $10,000, or any question which the court below shall certify to be of sufficient importance to demand it, to be reviewed on appeal or writ of error in the Supreme Court of the United States. It proposes to accomplish all these without involving the necessity of the creation of a solitary additional judge, and perhaps without involving the necessity of a single dollar's additional expense. It seems to me these considerations imperatively demand the passage of this bill.

I have not time to examine in detail the great variety of amendments which have been offered. I must content myself with saying that, in so far as they propose to affect the bill, in my judgment they that, in so far as they propose to affect the bill, in my judgment they will add nothing to its efficiency; whereas, on the other hand, their adoption might jeopardize its passage.

adoption might jeopardize its passage.

It was quite to be expected that gentlemen would prefer that the proposed appellate courts in their respective circuits should be located in their metropolitan cities. Their constituents would expect that they should endeavor to have the courts so located. The consequence of that is that there is a great number of amendments proposing to change the places designated in the bill for the holding of these appellate courts. But I appeal to this House to say if the enactment of a measure of the importance of the one now pending should be jeopardized by a controversy over the mere locality of the

As a matter of course no bill can be passed which will meet the views of everybody. Our Government itself, our Constitution, and the laws under which we live are the offspring of compromise and concession. There has been considerable controversy as to whether the appellate court for my circuit should be located in the city of Louisville or in the city of Cincinnati, or whether it should be made migra-

As I remarked on the day before yesterday, I had nothing to do personally with fixing the locality of that court. It was determined upon by the committee, with almost entire unanimity, without any influence of mine; it meets the approbation of the justices of the Supreme Court; and I submit that the passage of the bill ought not to be impeded by making a change in that or in any other particular, especially when we consider that the mere difference in distance amounts to but a bagatelle under our present system of travel. Cincinnati and Louisville are only four hours distant from each other, while I believe that in the city of Louisville the accommodations for the court, and for counsel who may attend it, are equal to those afforded by any other city on this continent. And I assure my eminent friend from Cincinnati that when he shall come down to Louisville to try a cause he will be treated with the most distinguished consid-

Mr. EAMES. I wish to ascertain from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Knorr] what change in the existing law is made by the seventh section of this bill which requires a bond to be given upon the suing out of a writ of error or an appeal.

Mr. KNOTT. I am not sure that I understand the gentleman's question; but, if I apprehend it correctly, I will say to him that the bill in that regard makes no material change in the law as it now

I now yield three minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who wishes to submit some considerations in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give seven reasons why this bill should pass.

1. The bill is necessary to relieve the Supreme Court and thereby secure the speedy decision of cases which may be pending therein. Section 12 of the bill will relieve the Supreme Court of many cases which can now go into it.
2. To the extent which the Supreme Court is relieved of cases, tri-

2. To the extent which the supreme courts is relieved of cases, fribunals are provided—the new courts of appeals—located in every circuit more conveniently for the bar and for suitors, and in which justice can be administered without denial or delay.

3. A remedy is given by section 10 of the bill to review judgments in criminal cases in which there is now no right of review. This is demanded alike to secure the rights of parties and uniformity in the administration of criminal justice.

4. Section 1 of the bill multiplies the number of places at which circuit courts shall be held, and so adds to the convenience of the bar and of suitors.

5. The same section proposes to reduce the expenses incurred for jurors by requiring only one panel of jurors for the circuit and district courts, unless the business shall require two.

6. It is a measure of economy, by reducing expenses to the Government, to the bar, and to suitors in court.

To the Government, expenses will be reduced by requiring fewer jurors and by reducing the distance which grand jurors and witnesses in criminal cases may be required to travel by reason of requiring circuit courts to be held at additional places.

To the her and suitors in court in civil as well as griminal cases.

To the bar and suitors in court in civil as well as criminal cases expenses will be reduced in the same manner and for the same rea-

7. To these I will add, the remedy given by the proviso to section 12 is an improvement on the law as it stands. It is as follows:

Provided. That if within the year after the entry of the judgment or decree sought to be reversed any party shall die, the personal representative or heir, as the case may require, may sue out, or be made party to, a writ of error, without reviving the judgment or decree in the court in which the same was entered.

The Supreme Court at its present session, in a case in which I was counsel and which I understand will be published in the Philadelphia American Law Register, decided that where one of two judgment debtors died and a writ of error was sued out against the survivor, the executor of the deceased could not be made a party in the Supreme Court, but there must be a revivor in the court below. The proviso avoids delay and gives a better mode of proceeding.

Mr. KNOTT. Before the vote is taken, I wish simply to add that that the adoption of amendments will simply tend to obstruct and embarrass the passage of this measure. I think the safety of the bill requires that these amendments should be voted down as the question is taken upon them respectively:

At the request of several gentlemen I now ask unanimous consent that the following amendment, to come in as an additional section, may be considered as pending under the previous question; not that I favor it, but in order that the House may vote upon it:

SEC. 17. Any appeal or writ of error taken pursuant to the provisions of this act to the court of appeals may, by consent of parties, be taken to and heard by said court at any of the places named in this act for the sessions of said court.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to allowing a vote to be taken upon this amendment under the operation of the previous question?

Mr. CULBERSON. I object.

Mr. COLBERSON. I object.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent that Detroit may be voted upon as one of the places at which courts may be held. There is a proposition pending as to Cleveland and several other places.

Mr. HOOKER. I object, unless the amendment is read.

Mr. CONGER. I do not recollect the particular part of the bill or amendments in which this would properly come.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that there is objection to entertaining the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Culberson] to withdraw his objection to the entertainment of the amendment indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky proposing an additional section. When the gentleman understands that the amendment seeks simply the convenience of parties by permitting them to choose the most convenient court in which to make their appeals, I hardly think he can object. I ask him whether, with that understanding, he does object to the consideration of the amendment?

Mr. CULBERSON. If I may be allowed to explain, I will state the reason of my objection. This morning I understood from friends who had spoken to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee on my behalf for the simple privilege of giving my views in opposition to this bill, that that courtesy could not be extended to me; that the time allotted to him had already been pledged to other members of the House. Now, sir, this is a measure of great interest to my constituency.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas withdraw the objection he made?

Mr. CULBERSON. No, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for debate under the operation of the previous question has expired.

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to know whether or not the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has a right to designate what members on this floor shall discuss this bill?

The SPEAKER protempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that the chairman of the committee reporting the bill is entitled to an hour after the ordering of the previous question, which time he may allot according to his own discretion. That time has now expired

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, as I have not troubled the House The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas will recognize the expiration of the hour allowed for debate under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have a request to make of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas cannot ask the House for an extension of time beyond that limited by the rules.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky will recognize the impossibility of extending the time for debate even by unanimous consent.

unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. This House can do anything by unanimous consent

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent of the House to extend the time allotted for debate for the benefit of the gentlemen from Texas, [Mr. CULBERSON.] Is there objection?

Mr. McCRARY. What time does the gentleman from Texas desire?

Mr. CULBERSON. A very few minutes. How many will you give me † [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman want ? Mr. CULBERSON. Five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. KNOTT. I object unless some time is designated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas indicates

There was no objection.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I certainly am under great obligation to the House for its courtesy. I simply desire to say I am opposed to this bill in toto. I am frank to confess the business before the Supreme Court of the United States has grown to such extent that some remedy is demanded. But I deny, sir, that result has followed the fact that the number of States in this Union has increased, or that the population of this country has increased. or that the population of this country has increased, or that the business of the country has increased in the manner referred to by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCrary.] Iadmit that these have had their influence to increase the business of the Supreme Court, but I apprehend the increase of the number of judges on that bench would have met the natural increase of business before that tribunal.

The cause of the increase of the business in that tribunal I attribute to another cause rather than to those which have been referred to by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. For the last fifteen years the tendency of the Federal legislation of this country has been to take away power and importance from the States and vest them in the Federal Government, not only in a political, but even in a judicial aspect, until the result is to-day that the jurisdiction of the State courts has been contracted and diminished until they now present merely the skeleton of what they were formerly.

In the limited time given to me, of course, Mr. Speaker, I cannot elaborate this idea; but I desire to say that the only way in which this evil can be remedied is for the Congress of the United States to take away that jurisdiction which has been vested in the Federal courts, but which rightfully belongs to the State courts, and re-invest it in those tribunals. If you will do that, Mr. Speaker, you will find that the time of the Supreme Court will conform itself to the business, and that there will be no trouble in disposing of the business which will come before it.

I wish to call attention to the fact that if you create these courts, if you establish these appellate courts in the nine circuits of the United States, the result will be that we never can re-invest the jurisdiction of which we have already divested the State courts of this Union under a policy hostile to the States.

My impression is that the best way to accomplish the object we have in view is to defeat this bill and reframe the law on the subject have in view is to defeat this bill and reframe the law on the subject of the transfer or removal of causes from State courts into the Federal courts. If you will do that you will find that the Federal courts and the Supreme Court as now organized are fully equal to the discharge of the business which will properly come before them.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, if you establish these courts in the nine circuits of this country they will build up an influence which the Congress of the United States can never overreach. They will encroach still further upon the jurisdiction of our State courts until the strange aponaly will be presented of the whole important business.

the strange anomaly will be presented of the whole important business of the country taken from the State courts and vested in the Federal courts. Therefore I am opposed to this bill.

I wish to call the attention of the House to another fact—I do not see how it has escaped the scrutiny of some of the gentlemen on this floor—and that is that the thirteenth section of this bill vastly increases the expenses of the Government. It provides that every Federal judge, whether of the district court, circuit court, or Supreme Court, who leaves his home to attend the sitting of this Federal court, shall receive, in addition to the salary now provided by law, extra pay of $10 a day, which in a few years will amount to a sum that will astonish the House.

I want to call the attention of the House to another fact in connec-I want to call the attention of the House to another fact in connection with that section of the bill, and it is this: That no judge who attends the appellate court, if he lives where the court is held, is entitled to this extra compensation, which is only allowed to those judges who have to travel away from their homes to the place where the court is held. A judge, living in the city of New Orleans, who attends a sitting of the appellate court at that place will not be entitled to receive this extra compensation, while a judge from Alabama or a judge from Texas will be entitled to extra compensation. This makes an unjust discrimination between the judges: and possibles This makes an unjust discrimination between the judges; and besides that it amasses a debt which we would have to pay, which there is no necessity to incur.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to say just one word more.
Mr. BLAND. I hope the time of the gentleman will be extended.

There has been no debate allowed against this bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have never troubled the House before, and I do not know that I will do it again. I only ask for a few moments

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the time of the gentleman being extended.

Mr. McCRARY. I shall not object if I may be allowed to say a word in reply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot accept a conditional objection.

Mr. BLAND. There has been a great deal of debate in favor of the bill, and I want to hear something against it. There is a good the bill, and I want to hear something against it. There is a good deal which can be said against it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the time of the gentleman being extended.

Mr. KNOTT. I object.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Culberson] will now withdraw the objection he made to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] being considered as pending.

Mr. Culberson. I will, if I am allowed to read the most important argument the gentleman from Kentucky, as representing the Committee on the Judiciary, has urged in favor of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I trust the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee will withdraw his objection to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAYLER. Can I have the floor to make a motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs to say that he will not recognize any gentleman as having the floor until the House will not recognize any gentleman as having the floor until the House will not recognize any gentleman as having the floor until the House will resume such order as will enable its business to be transacted intelli-

Mr. KNOTT. I withdraw the objection if the gentleman from Texas does not occupy more than five minutes.

Mr. SAYLER. Have I the floor to make a motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] does not have the floor. Is there further objection to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SAYLER. I object, unless I am permitted to offer my motion. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made by the gentleman

Mr. SAYLER. O; I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will again inquire if there is objection to the prolongation of the time of the gentleman from Several Members. For how long?

Mr. CULBERSON. For two minutes.
There being no further objection, Mr. CULBERSON's time was extended for two minutes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Excet by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCrary.] and aside from the arguments which relate to the proper places at which the courts shall be held, I have heard no reasons urged for the passage of this bill, except perhaps one reason urged by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and as so much stress has been placed upon that reason by the chairman of the committee, I beg to have his remarks, which I send to the desk, read to the House. It is about the only reason offered by the gentleman from House. It is about the only reason offered by the gentleman from Kentucky for the passage of the bill; and it is the strongest reason, except that Louisville is the proper place for the court in the sixth circuit.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Why, Mr. Speaker, if the melancholy Prince of Denmark, when he paused upon the briak of suicide, had been the victim of such a tardy system as this, he would not have hesitated a solitary moment to take the fatal plunge. He might have borne "the whips and scorns of time," "the proud man's contumely;" he might have neved himself up even to bear "the insolence of office;" he might have got along un ler "the pangs of despised love;" but when he came to contemplate the "law's delay" he would not have hesitated a single moment.

The undiscovered country, from whose bourn No traveler returns, would have had no terrors for him. O, no! He would have said, Let me emigrate to that country, or any other country, rather than this.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker—— The SI'EAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired. Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.
Mr. KASSON. I now ask the gentleman from Texas does he withdraw his objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Knorr] being considered as pending?

Mr. CULBERSON. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BLAND. I object. I object to any further amendments being

Mr. KNOTT. I now call for a vote on the bill and pending amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question will first be on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 10, line 5, insert the words "except in capital cases."

Mr. CAULFIELD. I ask that the Clerk report the section as it will read if amended as proposed.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That a writ of error may be sued out from the final judgment of a circuit or district court in any criminal action to the proper court of appeals within ninety days after the entry of such judgment; but such writ of error shall not operate as a stay of proceedings except in capital cases, unless it is so ordered by a judge of the court of appeals. The judgment or decision upon such writ of error shall be remitted to the circuit or district court appealed from, to be enforced according to law.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were aves 111, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was that offered by Mr. LAWRENCE, as fol-

Strike out the word "Louisville," in line 7, section 11, and insert the word "Cin-

Mr. PAYNE. I ask that the amendment which I offered as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Law-RENCE] be reported.

Mr. PAYNE's substitute was read, as follows:

Substitute for the amendment of Mr. LAWRENCE the following: Strike out the word "Louisville" and insert the following: "at Louisville, Cincinnati, and Cleveland, successively."

The question being taken on Mr. Payne's substitute, there were—ayes 46, noes 78; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. Lawrence and Mr. Payne.

The House again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 101.

So Mr. Payne's substitute for Mr. Lawrence's amendment was not

The question recurred on Mr. LAWRENCE's amendment; and there were—ayes 90, noes 52.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was that offered by Mr. Bradford, which was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "New Orleans" where it occurs in line 6 of section 11 of the bill, and inserting, in lieu thereof, the word "Mobile."

Mr. REAGAN. Is that debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question is in operation on the bill and amendments, and these amendments are not open to debate.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was that offered by Mr. Hopkins, which was read, as follows:

Amend section 11, line 5, by inserting after the word "Philadelphia" the words and in the city of Pittsburgh, alternately."

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent for one-half minute to make a statement. I desire to say that this amendment is not objected to by the members of the House from Philadelphia.

The question being taken, there were ayes 31, noes not counted. So the amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was that offered by Mr. REAGAN, which was read, as follows:

Amend section 3 by striking out all after the word "circuit," in line 6, down to and including the word "thereto," in line 13, and by inserting in lieu thereof the words, "and two judges of said courts of appeals, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum of said court; and that the compensation of these appellate judges shall be the same as that allowed to circuit judges of the United Sta.es."

Mr. REAGAN. I was necessarily absent on a committee yesterday, and was not here to discuss that amendment; and therefore I ask leave to withdraw it.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

The next amendment, that offered by Mr. REAGAN, was read, as

Amend section 12 by striking out of lines 8 and 26 the word "10" where it occurs in each line, and by inserting, instead of this word, in each line, the word "5."

So as to provide that the matter in controversy in cases where appeals shall be allowed shall be $5,000 instead of $10,000.

The question was taken on the amendment; and on a division there

-ayes 27, noes 90.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was that offered by Mr. REAGAN, to amend the bill by striking out the thirteenth section, as follows:

SEC. 13. That any district judge who shall, in the pursuance of the provisions of this act, attend any court of appeals at any place other than his own residence, shall be allowed his reasonable expenses for travel and attendance, not to exceed $10 per day, to be certified by the clerk and paid by the marshal of the district in which such courtshall be held, and allowed to him in his accounts with the United States.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 75, noes 67. Mr. THORNBURGH. I call for tellers. Mr. DOUGLAS and Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 117, nays 125, not voting 46; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,
Mr. STEVENSON said. I desire to say that my colleagues Mr. Anderson and Mr. Hurlbut are absent by permission of the House.

The next amendment was that offered by Mr. Philips, of Missouri;

which was read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "appeals," in line 6 of section 10, the following: "or unless the plaintiff in error, against whom a judgment of conviction has been rendered, shall, within the time hereby limited for such writ of error, enter into bond, payable to the United States, in a sum to be fixed by the judge trying the cause, with one or more sureties, to be approved by such judge or the clerk of the court, to the effect that he will prosecute with diligence and effect the said writ, and abide by and perform the judgment or order of the court of appeals."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was that offered by Mr. Wells, of Mississippi; which was read as follows:

In line 6, section 11, strike out "New Orleans" and insert instead "Jackson, Mississippi."

The question was taken; and on a division there were ayes 29, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was that offered by Mr. Hooker; which was read as follows:

In lines 8 and 9 of section 12 strike out the words "$10,000" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. McCRARY. I rise to a question of order. The amendment now pending has been voted upon and decided. The same amendment was offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLACKBURN.) Will the gentleman from Iowa refer to the previous amendment of which he speaks?

Mr. McCRARY. It was an amendment offered by the gentleman

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Iowa that that amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. McCRARY. No, sir, not the amendment relating to the jurisdiction of the court; it was the second amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment referred to by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 12 by striking out of lines 8 and 26 the word "10" where it occurs in each line and by inserting instead of this word in each line the word "5."

Mr. McCRARY. It is precisely the same in effect as the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. I would say that the words are different in my amendment, although the effect of it may be the same; but the words are not the same as in the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and therefore it is susceptible of being offered

I would ask the indulgence of the House to allow me to make a few remarks on my amendments.

Mr. RUSK. I object

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa, the amendment being, in the judgment of the Chair, substantially the same as that offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The next amendment was that offered by Mr. Hooker, which was

Amend section 3, in line 16, by adding, after the words "shall preside," these words: "Provided, That the senior district judge shall not preside in any case decided by him as such district judge."

Mr. McCRARY. I think there is no objection to that amendment; it is substantially what the bill now provides.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The next amendment was by Mr. Tucker, as follows:

In section 12, line 4, insert after the word "had" the words "in all civil and crim-

In line 7, after "appeals," insert "in a civil case."
In line 9, after "or," insert "in any civil or criminal case."
In line 11, after "States, or," insert "upon the construction or validity of."

So that that portion of the section will read as follows

So that that portion of the section will read as follows:

That the decision of the court of appeals upon questions of fact shall in all cases, except as hereinafter provided, be final and conclusive; but a review upon the law may be had in all civil and criminal cases, upon writ of error or appeal in the manner now provided by law, to the Supreme Court of the United States, from every final judgment or decree rendered upon any decision of a court of appeals in a civil case where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $40,000, or in any civil or criminal case where the adjudication involves a question upon the construction of the Constitution of the United States, or upon the construction or validity of any treaty or law of the United States, or where the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court.

The question was upon agreeing to the amendment, and upon a division there were ayes 41.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. TUCKER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.
Accordingly, the amendment was not agreed to.
The next amendment was by Mr. O'BRIEN, to strike out "Richmond" and insert "Baltimore," in line 6 of section 11.
The amendment was not agreed to.
The next amendment was by Mr. New, to strike out "Louisville" and insert "Indianapolis," in line 7, section 11.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. This amendment is not now in order, the House having already adopted an amendment striking out "Louisville" and inserting "Cincinnati."
Mr. CONGER. There has been no amendment acted upon taking this court into another circuit, as here proposed.

this court into another circuit, as here proposed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order to strike out what the House has inserted. Mr. NEW. The amer The amendment I intended to offer, and which I supposed I had offered until I saw it printed, was in line 8 of section 11, to strike out "Chicago" and insert "Indianapolis."

The next amendment was by Mr. Baker, of Indiana, to insert after "Chicago," in line 8 of section 11, the words "and Indianapolis alternately."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was by Mr. Wilshire, to strike out "Saint Louis" and insert "Little Rock" in line 9 of section 11.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was by Mr. Magoon, to strike out "first Tuesday" and insert "third Wednesday" in line 11 of section 11; so that portion of the section will read:

The first term of said court of appeals shall be held at each of said places on the third Wednesday in November, 1676, &c.

Mr. McCRARY. That amendment ought to be adopted. The first Tuesday in November, 1876, is the day of the next presidential elec-

The amendment was agreed to, upon a division, ayes 129, noes not counted.

The next amendment was by Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, to strike out of section 11 the following:

That a writ of error may be sued out from the final judgment of a circuit or district court in any criminal action to the proper court of appeals within ninety days after the entry of such judgment.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Upon the application of any party alleging that he is aggrieved by the final judgment of a circuit or district court in any criminal action, a writ of error shall be sued out from such final judgment to the proper court of appeals within ninety days after the entry of such judgment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was by Mr. Page, to insert after "San Fransco," in line 10 of section 11, the words "and Sacramento alternately."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was by Mr. Conger, to add to section 10 the following:

Provided, however, That all appeals and writs of error taken, allowed, or sued out under this act from the final judgments or decrees of the circuit or district courts for the eastern and western districts of Michigan shall be taken to the court of appeals for the seventh circuit, to be held in the city of Chicago, which court of appeals shall have jurisdiction of all such appeals and writs of error, the same as over cases arising within the seventh circuit.

Mr. CONGER. That proviso should be added to section 11, and not, as stated in the amendment, to section 10. I ask consent to modify as stated in the amendment, to section 10. Task consent to modify the amendment accordingly.

There was no objection, and the amendment, as modified, was agreed to, upon a division, ayes 100, noes not counted.

The next amendment was by Mr. EAMES, to strike out all of section 7 after the words "on appeal," at the close of the first sentence.

Mr. EAMES. I ask leave to withdraw that amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

The next amendment was by Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, to add to line 6 of section 11 the words "and city of Raleigh alternately."

The amendment was not agreed to, on a division, ayes 23, noes not counted.

The next amendment was by Mr. Kehr, to strike out of section 12 the words "the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court," and to insert in lieu the words "the court shall certify that the judges are divided in opinion upon the legal question involved in such judgment or decree."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was by Mr. LAPHAM, to strike out the words "in the city of Albany," line 4, section 11, and insert in lieu thereof "alternately in the city of New York and the city of Syracuse."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The last amendment was by Mr. Caldwell, of Tennessee, to strike out, in line 7 of section 11, the words "in the city of Louisville," and insert "in the cities of Cincinnati, Louisville, and Nashville alternately."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All the amendments having been disposed of, the question now is upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SCALES. Is it in order at this time to move to recommit this bill, as amended, to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair that motion is not now in order, the previous question having been ordered and not being yet exhausted.

The question was taken upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time; and upon a division there were ayes 117, noes 79.

Before the result of the vote was announced,
Mr. SPRINGER called for tellers.

Pending the motion to adjourn-

Mr. Parsons was granted leave of absence for two weeks on account of important business.

Mr. Harris, of Massachusetts, was granted an extension of leave of absence for ten days from Monday next.

SESSION OF SATURDAY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House the session of to-morrow will be for debate only as in Committee of the Whole, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Illinois,

Mr. Eden, will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to, upon a division—ayes 127, noes 84; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox.) The Chair will state that to-day is set apart by order of the House for debate only as in Committee of the Whole, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] will occupy the chair.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS

Mr. CHITTENDEN Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to represent here a large, compact, and intelligent constituency, actively engaged and deeply interested in the honest commerce of the country, who have suffered severely for eight years from a depreciated currency. The question of good money has become of vital importance to them, and they regard it as equally so to the whole country, and look with eagerness to this Congress for such practical wisdom in legislation as the case imperatively demands.

We see, sir, with our own eyes that a disease of some sort has fastened upon all the material interests of our country. It touches already nearly every man and every home in the land. Its victims are already nearly every man and every home in the land. Its victims are not by any means diminishing. Is it not our duty as intelligent and faithful representatives of the people to find out the nature of this disease and apply the true remedy? Can we do this too quickly for our own honor or our country's welfare?

There is a popular theory, Mr. Speaker, that my subject has been plowed and harrowed until no spot remains untilled. But that is a great and grave mistake. I think contraction a field too long neglected, and at enormous cost. I differ radically with the gentleman from Pannsylvania. In my indemnet the logal-tander debt of the from Pennsylvania. In my judgment the legal-tender debt of the United States is the root of that towering growth of speculation, extravagance, and taxation which threatens to sweep us all into an abyss of ruin. The real question is how to dispose of the legal-tenabyss of ruin. The real question is how to dispose of the legal-ten-der debt? This is the most momentous question that Congress or the people have ever had to consider except the question of slavery. It is the supplement and sequel of the war for the Union. It confronts and hinders the restoration of confidence. It is a menace to-day, to the integrity of the nation, and if it must continue to oppress the people and blast the commerce of a country which of itself is God's fairest heritage, I am not disposed to be any wise responsible for it.

I regard our mixed currency system as a three-fold anomaly. In the first place, we have the legal-tender notes, a device and invention as truly a war measure as the building of forts to protect this Capitol or the construction of the monitor with which Worden fought the Merrimac. These notes were issued for war supplies when the Government of the United States had no money, precisely as the confederate government issued its notes for war supplies when it had no money. In either case the notes represent exactly the same thing, namely, the waste of war, and the chances of war have determined the present value of one and the worthlessness of the other.

In the second place, we have banks founded with real capital, in general harmony with the genius of our free institutions and the demands of honest commerce, issuing currency every dellar of which is secured by gold-interest-bearing bonds at 90 per cent. of their par value, which bonds it is important to remember sell in the chief marts of the world for more than par in gold itself.

In the third place, by an act of Congress the bank currency I have described, every dollar of which has in fact more than a dollar in gold back of it, is redeemable in notes which are useless for the liquidation of debts beyond our national boundaries, and only of value within them because the law through a forced and unnatural reading within them because the law through a forced and unnatural reading of the Constitution has made them legal tender. Such, Mr. Speaker, is our "philosophical" system of currency, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will loan me his descriptive term, eleven years after the close of the war. I make no comments; but hope I may be pardoned for saying that I enjoyed the "collision" which occurred here the other day in referring it to two committees.

I gladly assume that the people have declared, at least in the abstract, for an early resumption of specie payments; and I also believe that the great majority are educated and prepared to discard all that the great majority are educated and prepared to discard all shams and contrivances and support their representatives in such legislation as the present exigencies demand. Congress resolved last winter to resume in 1879; but everybody can see now that something winter to resume in 1879; but everybody can see now that something more is necessary. To resume coin payments after what has happened is a process, a series of actions, a work for time and natural forces properly called into play. No man can tell how long it will take; neither is it important to know, if only we begin right.

The law of January 14 embodied some fractions of good, for which let us be thankful. For one thing, it disposed of the supremely ridiculous currency distribution business which had sorely avoid Con-

ulous currency-distribution business, which had sorely vexed Congress for nearly half a generation; and, when rightly understood, it clearly provides currency enough, and not too much, as I shall presently show, wholly independent of legal-tender. It also secured a temporary equilibrium, a sort of armistice, between the opposing forces of rectitude and repudiation. But the equilibrium is unstable. We cannot stand where we are. We must advance with courage, or our vantage ground will be lost. How, then, shall we advance? The answer to this question seems to me now as clear as sunlight. Our way is as the strait gate! We have to renounce our folly. We have to turn from the crooked and blind ways of schemers, and dreamers. A mountain of vicious legal-tender debt confronts us. We can neither get round it nor provide for it in a lump. We must hew it away to the level of truth, honor, and common sense, and there, and there only, can we stand to rebuild and restore the waste places. We must fund the legal-tender debt. Not in 3.65 permanent bonds, because there is no money in this country in its normal healthful condition to invest at that rate of interest. Not in interconvertible bonds, for many reasons, but especially because such funding is only another name for the most unique and gigantic machine for speculation ever invented. With it any one of a score of great operators in Wall street might control at will, with absolute precision, from week to week, for private ends, the bank reserves of the metropolis, with such results to the business of the whole country as I need not stop to foreshadow. We must fund the legal-tender notes permanently at to foreshadow. We must fund the legal-tender notes permanently at the minimum popular rate of interest, not too fast, but steadily, year after year, until they are extinct. And why not? Are they not an unnatural product? Were they not born of an extreme exigency, now happily passed away, when the noise of battle was on sea and land? Was it not explicitly provided when they were first issued that they should at all times be fundable at the option of the holder? Would their authors or Congress have tolerated them for a moment but for such promise? Surely I need not too for instructions. but for such promise? Surely I need not stop for an instant to answer these questions.

But have we not too much currency? The gentleman from Pennsylvania says "No" with great emphasis. Let us look into that a little. And here I challenge candid and intelligent attention, not to any mere argument of mine, but to testimony, which is always better than argument.

First, I wish to call your attention, as I have promised, to the fact that with legal-tender notes withdrawn we are sure to have currency enough under existing laws. More than two thousand national banks now doing business, and new banks without limit, are at liberty to issue all the currency that can be profitably employed whenever and wherever it is needed and called for by legitimate commerce. This is the law, and it is right. It is also decisive, absolutely so. The banker is as free to establish his bank and issue currency on a sound basis as the property of the property of the commerce. the merchant is to invest his capital in cotton or iron, as the farmer is to plow more acres or breed more sheep. In the name of reason, is not that enough? When it was first proposed to give the banks all this liberty, it was widely held to mean inflation of the most gigantic proportions, and there are some who yet so regard it. But I think experience has shown that bankers as a class are no more idiots than other men; and while the law requires them to put up for every dollar of currency issued that which will sell for a gold dollar both at home and abroad, there is no more danger of excessive issues than there is danger that Mr. Vanderbilt and Mr. Scott will amuse themselves by laying gold tracks for their railway trains.

To avoid misapprehension let me say here that I have had no personal interest in any national bank for many years, but I regard the hue and cry against them as unintelligent and unworthy of serious notice. A good many of them will have to go into liquidation, but others, better managed, will take their places when needed. We cannot dispense with such banks as merchants need any more than we can dispense with savings-banks, and when we war upon or abolish either it will be in regular order for Congress to enact that our car riages shall go without wheels and our farms go without the plow and

And now, Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to facts of history which demonstrate and show conclusively, if experience proves any-thing, that we shall never find a basis for confidence and fresh enterprise until we have largely contracted our currency. In the crisis of 1837 the banks of the State of New York suspended specie payments on the 10th of May. To save their charters they were compelled to resume on or before the 10th of May, 1838. They did so resume, and in doing it they contracted their issues from $25,500,000 on the 1st of January, 1837, to $13,000,000 in round figures on the 1st of January, 1838. Here, sir, is a case where the leading State of the Union, thirty-seven years ago, compelled its banks to keep faith with the holders of their paper, the doing of which forced them to contract nearly 50 per cent in a single year; and the point to be observed and remembered is that there was no complaint. The dead were buried; the living were supported, and confidence and hope revived.

I have no doubt, sir, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania disapproved when he read the proposition of the Secretary of the Treas ury to fund the legal-tender debt at the rate of two millions a month, or $24,000,000 in a year. But think of it! New York in 1837, with less than $26,000,000 ont, withdrew twelve and a half millions in a year, and was ready at the close of it to redeem the rest on demand. The grand Republic in 1876, the centennial year, with $372,000,000 of debt under protest, with the people everywhere crying out for relief, proposes, through its minister of finance, to pay at the rate of two millions a month, and a man can be found in Congress to oppose it!

Well, sir, I know the gentleman is sincere. His own State in 1837 enjoyed the sunset glories of the old United States Bank. That congress a min at the time and could not sent the sincere.

cern was a ruin at the time, and could not pay its debts, and his State did not resume with New York. A year or two later on, this favored Government paper machine, in its death struggles, sold its rags to the extent of ten millions or more to New York, and nearly broke us again. If the gentleman is consistent, he will say, and maintain as best he can, that New York made a frightful blunder in contracting in 1837, and brought unnecessary ruin upon her people. But he will convince no one of that.

The banks of the whole country suspended again in 1857, and resumed, generally, in the following year; and it is important for our purpose to compare the contraction and its immediate consequences in that crisis with the inflation which followed the panic of 1873 and its consequences.

The paper circulation of the whole country in 1857 was $215,000,000. In 1858 it had contracted to $156,000,000. The bank loans in 1857 were $685,000,000; in 1858, $583,000,000. Here is contraction of $59,000,000 in circulation, and $102,000,000 in bank loans; an aggregate of $161,000,000 in one year.

Note the consequences of this sharp contraction. It was a fierce but short struggle, in which rotten banks and speculators of every name and bankrupt merchants and manufacturers were denied accommodations and forced to break and adjust their affairs. On the other hand, the solvent and honest, with rare exceptions, found all the help they required, with such sacrifices as they cheerfully ac-cepted, to maintain their credit. In the exceptional cases, those who were really solvent promptly recovered from temporary embarras

The result was as natural as the growth of grass in spring-time, and may be as easily understood. Capital, always timid and watchful, saw that the wrecks of a wild speculative epoch were cleared ful, saw that the wrecks of a wild speculative epoch were cleared away, and thus confidence was rapidly re-established, so that the two years from July, 1858, until the war clouds appeared, are properly spoken of as among the most prosperous in our history.

We come now to the panic of 1873, and I propose to contrast the issues of that with the history I have just recited. The law of June 20, 1874, nine months after the crash, instead of providing for the gradual payment of the legal-tender debt, as it should have done, made a new injection of twenty-six millions of it into our "philosophical" currency system, whereby bank credits were lawfully and enormously new injection of twenty-six millions of it into our 'philosophical' currency system, whereby bank credits were lawfully and enormously enlarged. And the law of January 14, 1875, enacts that Government shall pay off its legal-tender debt only at the rate of 80 per cent. of the fresh issues of bank currency by its subjects! Here it will be observed that in both its great financial measures since the panic of 1873 Congress clings to the fatal and preposterous theory that more currency is the cure for the ills we suffer; and that, too, in the face of a reduction in the relevance of hereign current there. is the cure for the his we suffer; and that, too, in the face of a reduction in the volume of business transactions equal to more than one-third (I speak within bounds) of the whole business of the country, and also in the face of enormous and unprecedented shrinkage in values, already far in advance of those of 1857, but still going on and on!

Here again, sir, is testimony which is more than argument. We had contraction, sharp, vehement, in 1857. Confidence and enterprise were restored in 1858. We had wild inflation in 1873 and 1874.

In 1876, confidence and enterprise are lost!

Such is the contrast. Why does it exist? I will tell you why. In 1857 we had no dishonored legal-tender debt—another name for Government machinery for tiding over all forms of extravagance and bankruptcy-as we had in 1873 and still have. The race of brilliant men who now wait for trade to grow up to a volume of currency largely in excess of that in use at the climax of the railway mania had not then become powerful. Bank credits and currency were then left to respond to natural laws, as they do not now. The figures and statements I have given you are startling, but they are also true, and it is high time for Congress to know the truth and respect it.

But, says an objector, the crash of 1873 differed from that of 1857.

It had wider proportions, and required different treatment. But did it? Principles are eternal! Your child has a broken leg. Your good surgeon comes in with his splints and bandages, and cures it in the regular way. Next month your house falls down, and the arms and legs of your household are all broken. The same surgeon calls, and he treats all as he treated one, or you will have a family of cripples. You meet a dozen men starving in the street, you give them bread and they live. To-morrow you meet a hundred, and because there are a hundred will you feed them with stones that they may die?

I fearlessly affirm that there is not one argument in support of

I fearlessly affirm that there is not one argument in support of the present volume of currency which is not equally tenable to justify its indefinite expansion on the flimsiest pretext.

No man, for example, in his right mind will pretend that it required as much money to buy sixty tons of railroad iron at $50 per ton in 1875 as it did to buy one hundred tons of the same thing at $75 per ton in 1872. These figures fairly represent the comparative prices of railroad iron and the quantities in use in the respective years. I might give a thousand such examples; but one is as good as a thousand for my purpose; the rest are known and read by all men. A child can understand that a merchant who employs ten ships or ten men to do understand that a merchant who employs ten ships or ten men to do the appropriate work of six will reap nothing but loss while the folly is persisted in.

Unless all economic laws known and accepted by us prior to the war have been abrogated or reversed; unless the sun itself is turned back; unless we are hereafter to cultivate strawberries in ice-houses, and plow our fields with the heads of our horses harnessed to the whiffletrees; unless we are in the future to build our houses without foundations, and navigate the seas in paper ships; we shall never restore confidence and solid enterprise to our country until we make a final and irreversible decree against the legal-tender debt abomination, leaving the commerce of the country free to fix its own laws in respect to the volume of currency and bank credits. The case is so clear, Mr. Speaker, that I almost feel it to be an impeachment of the common sense of the House to argue it seriously. The laws which govern it are as immutable as the force which turns the earth upon its axis. The commerce of the country is stuffed to death with the unkept promises of Government. Yes! with the broken promises of the United States, whose flag is the symbol of honor and power everywhere save at home! where save at home!

Disguise it as we may, there is but one remedy for existing evils We suffer through dishonor. We shall begin to prosper when we become honest, and not before.

Is it not enough that all, or nearly all, good investments, good enterprises, and solvent interests have suffered severely for more than two years because some people thought the plague of legal-tender would restore impossible values, in the interest of the unfortunate, the reckless, or the wicked? Is there a true sign in any direction of a restoration of confidence and the profitable employment of capital now idle, so long as the present condition of the currency continues? Not one such sign that I can discover.

It is idle to talk of paying legal-tenders in coin in 1879 without steadily funding them prior to that. There is nothing in history, nothing in the present commerce of the world, nothing in our own matchless resources, unless we find where to mine gold and silver pure as we cut the granite, to warrant the hope that we can borrow or hoard gold enough to resume and maintain coin payments with our present volume of currency. Our foreign debt and enormous taxes at home forbid all such schemes. Resumption by Government means resumption by two thousand national banks. To think of that under existing circumstances is to think without reasoning, and to ignore history, experience, and common sense.

But some one may inquire what besides funding? What shall the banks redeem in? We are in a wilderness of excessive currency, and though our way out is perfectly straight and no longer obscure, there are some chasms to be crossed only as we reach them. All present indications with the content of particular to the content of the are some chasms to be crossed only as we reach them. All present indications point to the voluntary surrender of national-bank notes for the next year or two more rapidly than required to preserve easy relations to the redeeming agent. When the clause requiring the banks to redeem in legal-tender shall be repealed, the time should be fixed for them to redeem in coin. For the present, funding with due caution is our chief and only concern. We know it to be right. We promised to do it, and if we know anything about it we can see that there is no other way to dispose of legal-tenders so easily. We had, sir, in the years first succeeding the close of the war, ample surplus revenues, which might have been used to pay off the legal-tender debt, and the failure so to apply them is an ineffaceable blot upon the statesmanfailure so to apply them is an ineffaceable blot upon the statesman-ship of our time. But surplus revenues are no more for us! Some other method must be devised. My proposition is, to authorize the issue of four millions of bonds per month for eight months of each year, beginning with February and including September, the bonds to run forty years, bearing interest at a rate of not exceeding 4½ per cent. per annum, and to be sold to the highest bidder on the first Tuesday of the month for legal-tenders, the latter to be immediately destroyed. This seems to me to be a feasible, conservative, honest, and effective measure. Nobody can mistake its meaning or its scope. It means clear away the wrecks with all proper forbearance. It means bury the dead that the living may continue to live. It means legislation for those who live by hard work and on fixed salaries, instead of legislation exclusively in the interest of gamblers and hopeless bankrupts; and just here is the line of battle, henceforth, both in and out of Congress. Finally my proposition, simple as it is, means specie payments, perhaps not in 1879—I think not—but as soon as

How long, Mr. Speaker, shall the precious resources of our country be trifled with f Shall Congress, year after year, waste its time in debating mere paper contrivances unknown to experience, which no mortal man can explain to the common intelligence? Are we to assume that the people of this country consent to be given over to shams and delusions? Debt is not money! Surely it is not. The legal-tender debt of the United States is not good money! If we persist to the contrary, the time will come when our money will be interconvertible, or at least of equal value with confederate money. That is the kind of interconvertible money we are in danger of having! Seven thousand seven hundred and forty commercial failures on record for 1875, and a good many more unrecorded! For January, 1876, the number far exceeds that of the corresponding period of last year! The gentleman from Pennsylvania attributes these disasters in large measure to the contraction of the currency under the resumption bill of last year. But he is greatly mistaken. He might with equal reason, in my humble judgment, charge them to the amnesty bill of his colleague, not yet a law, and I will undertake to prove that, if called upon, to either of the committees having in charge the "philosophical" currency of the gentleman. Let the gentleman try an experiment. Let him sink countless ships all along the channel of the Potomac, from the bridge to its mouth, and then with his splendid rhetoric, and polished sentences, invite clear-headed navigators in command of good ships outside to make sail over his wrecks. Will one of them accept the invitation ? Not one. No more, sir, shall capital and fresh enterprise traverse the wrecks which the neglected legal-tender debt has made and still conceals.

If this Congress shall achieve the enviable distinction of re-establishing the national honor by re-affirming the principle of funding, those who return here next year will find light breaking everywhere. No prophet can tell the ruins yet hidden and which must be revealed as a primary indispensable condition of a restoration of confidence.

Some say, If you fund the legal-tender debt you will lose interest you Some say, If you fund the legal-tender debt you will lose interest you are now saving. Well, sir, that argument appeals to some minds, and may be listened to here for aught I know; but in the counting-room of a reputable commercial establishment it should be regarded as worthy of a highwayman. What is the plain English of it? Just this: The rich debtor, having enjoyed his forced loan for a dozen years without a cent of interest, with icy audacity telling his impoverished creditors that he will not recognize his obligation because he cannot yet bring himself to pay interest. That is it precisely. True, you have saved nearly twenty millions a year, and the saving has cost the neonle two or three hundred millions a year. It has cost has cost the people two or three hundred millions a year. It has cost has cost the people two or three hundred millions a year. It has cost them their right to work and prosper. No man escapes. The idle bricklayers recently begging for work in one of our chief cities, and intimating at the same time that they might become criminals to obtain daily food, have lost their all. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the whole people suffer consciously or unconsciously, and will continue to suffer until the curse of the legal-tender debt is removed.

A few words more and I have done. On the 18th of December, 1865, the House of Representatives of the Thirty-eighth Congress voted, 144 to 6—a very significant vote—to its everlasting borner to with.

144 to 6—a very significant vote—to its everlasting honor, to with-draw legal-tender preparatory to a resumption of specie payments. I do not intend to say anything extravagant or sensational here; but when that law for contraction was repealed in 1868, I believed the act repealing it would cost the country more than the war for the Union had cost up to that time. I am sure now that I was right in that opinion. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that this is a case which admits of no close computations. There is no arithmetic equal to the task. Its very vastness is the true and only measure of the calamity. What we do know is that our magnificent heritage, alive with forty millions of free souls, and full of the richest gifts of nature's God, has been, for eight long years, given over to gambling and waste, and the end is not yet! Not yet! We know that the shadows are deeper and the victims yet! Not yet! We know that the shadows are deeper and the victin more numerous than they were when we came up here last year. Walso know that the battle between honor and dishonor is not ended.

The thing we need is an intelligent appreheusion of the present condition of the country, and courage to do our whole duty as becomes representatives of the American people, without any reference whatever to the next presidential election.

Mr. KELLEY obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Eden.) The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] desires not to be interrupted during his remarks. The Chair therefore requests that no one interrogate the gentleman until he has concluded.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is proper that I should express my thanks to the House for having set apart this session for debate, thus enabling me at this early day to perform my duty to the million of republican voters who were wounded and grieved by the tener and drift of the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Blaine,] as well as by many of his express allegations. This duty, though cheerfully assumed, is not a grateful one. For twelve years the gentleman and I have been associated on this floor, and I have been attached to him by more than mere party ties. Though many years my junior, I have found pleasure in regarding him as my leader, and have ever been glad to promote his advancement. Having found him on the side of the weak and oppressed throughout the great struggle now so happily terminated, I could not credit the rumors which prevailed at the opening of this Congress that he proposed to make an aggressive, hard-money speech, and was pained when I heard the Clerk read the resolution offered by his colleague and trusted friend [Mr. HALE] on the 15th of December, declaring that prompt legislative measures should be taken to render the ill-judged act providing for the resumption of specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879, effective "by placing in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury whatever power may be necessary to that end," and saw my friend give it his active support.

The sad condition of my constituents, who are mostly skilled work men, in establishments involving hundreds of millions of capital invested in land, buildings, machinery, and raw materials, when I returned to my district at the close of the Forty-third Congress alarmed me. It seemed to imperil the welfare of my country and the continued supremacy of that party which had brought it safely through the great and protracted trial by battle which was finally to determine that the United States constitute a nation to which American citizens owe primary allegiance. In the presence of this grave apprehension I devoted my time thenceforward till the assembling of this Congress to the promotion, by the use of voice and pen, of such a sentiment as would rescue the republican party from responsibility for a financial policy which was inaugurated by President Johnson's Secretary of the Treasury, Hugh McCulloch, and which has paralyzed the energies of the American people; deprived enterprise of a field for undertaking in every part of our broad country; suspended industry and curtailed production; reduced the value of every species of proportion of the country of erty save untaxed Government loans, thus bankrupting solvent manufacturers, merchants, bankers, savings-banks, and other corporations; which has robbed old men of the garnered results of long lives of industry, thrift, and probity, and deprived youth of just training for honorable pursuits in manhood by dooming it to enforced idleness; has reduced hitherto prosperous employing mechanics to poverty, and industrious laborers to pauperism; has added fearfully to the list of suicides, crowded insane asylums with suddenly impoverished patients, and opened as their only refuge station-houses and houses of correction to thousands of men and women who would find happiness in endur-ing the penalty of the primal curse could they be permitted to earn their bread in the sweat of their brow. Between the gentleman and myself there can be no co-operation on this subject, and here and now, in the name of more than a million of republicans who ascribe all these terrible consequences to the attempt of the Government of a debtor nation, whose debt is largely held by citizens of foreign countries, to effect the resumption of specie payments by contracting a volume of money already too restricted for the demands of our trade—in their name I protest against his right to speak in this behalf for the republican party and to exclude from its folds whosoever may dissent from the plausible but impracticable dogmas formulated by schoolmen and abstractionists which enslave his quick and powerful intellect, and against his right, when assuming so to speak, to charge that those who favor the repeal of the law under which the debtor and laboring classes are being ruthlessly destroyed with demanding the perpetuation of an irredeemable paper currency and with menacing the honor of the Government and the prosperity of the American people.

Nor, Mr. Speaker, must my protest end here, for the more, far more than a million honest, earnest republicans for whom I speak will reproach me if I fall also to protest in their name against his apologetic concession that the law providing for the issue of legal-tender paper money is constitutional, or to deny the correctness of his assertion that in the acts providing for its issue "the Government" "called to its aid a power never before exercised." They will also expect me to reveal his often reiterated demonstrated of all when the protections of all when the protections are the contractions are the co expect me to repel his often reiterated denunciation of all who protest against the repeal of the legal-tender clause as inflationists. know that production, consumption, and the commerce by which the products of labor are transferred to the consumer are the basis of pop-ular prosperity and the public revenue, and that these exchanges require a competent medium of exchange in adequate volume, and they therefore, desire to keep such notes in circulation, as France wisely does the inconvertible paper money she issues in time of war, or under other exigency, until a favorable balance of trade has brought into the country an equal amount of gold and silver and converted it into

Sir. having thus protested against the right of the gentleman to speak on this subject as he assumed to speak, for the republican party, let me proceed to examine his remarks somewhat in detail. This is not a pleasant duty, for I shall have to show that his allegations are loose and often unfounded, his deductions illogical and inconsequential, and

Is there any doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to establish paper money and make it legal tender? The Supreme Court of the United States settled this question by confirming the constitutional that the same law a solemn assurance and pledge that "the total amount of United States notes, issued and to be issued, shall never exceed $400,000,000."

This paragraph presents a strange admixture of truth and error. It ignores the causes by which the value of one commodity, gold, had tionality of the acts referred to by the gentleman, and in doing so left no room for such eloquent but irrelevant suggestions in support of the measure as he would rest it upon by quoting language imputed to John Milton. Not only does the Constitution empower Congress to emit such money, but lays upon it the duty to do it when the exigencies of the people or Government require, as it had already twice done in time of peace, and may be compelled by any of several causes to do again and from time to time. Does the gentleman hold that the Government may delegate the execution of a power which it does not possess? That it may not he will admit to be an axiomatic and indisputable proposition, yet he must remember that in both acts creating banks of the United States Congress delegated the power of issuing notes which should be a legal tender in payment of all debts and obligations due the Government, and therefore have the quality of general acceptability as money by all the people of the country.

These precedents, sustained by frequent decisions of the Supreme Court, must have done much to mitigate the agony under which the gentleman would have us believe distinguished Senators voted for the legal-tender bill, when without the money established by it the Government would have been hopelessly helpless. But, sir, had these precedents not existed, the process of reasoning by which the power and duty to furnish the Government and people with money at a time when the Government, the banks, nor the people could obtain specie from any quarter in exchange for any species of property, or upon any security, was so simple and conclusive that it doubtless occurred to every Senator. The argument was stated thus by my late townsman and friend, Sidney George Fisher, in an article which appeared in the North American Review for July, 1864:

and friend, Sidney George Fisher, in an article which appeared in the North American Review for July, 1864:

One power which every government of a civilized people must possess is that of providing both for itself and for the people a circulating medium, for the simple reason that it is a matter of absolute necessity to both which the government alone can supply. A circulating medium which the people do in fact use, which both they and the government, by reason of controlling natural causes, must use, is the currency to which the power and the duty of the government must apply. Whether it be made of paper, or leather, or iron, or gold and silver, or any other material, it is money if the people do and must use it as money; and the government must use it too, and create it and regulate its value, or be shorn of an essential prerogative and fail in the performance of an important duty. Had our Constitution omitted entirely a grant of power over money, the power must have been implied; for without it the Government would have been unable to perform any of its functions. But the power was not withheld, while in the process of time it has happened that paper money has become practically that which, far more largely than coin, both the people and the Government must use.

The restriction implied in the language of the Constitution refers not to the power, but to the mode in which it is to be exercised. Now, the power is the principal thing, the manner of using it subordinate; the first is permanent, the second accident. Therefore, if one of the two must be sacrificed, the second must yield to the first; for without the first, the Government is wholly impotent either for its own preservation or the well-being of the people. The truth of this reasoning will be more apparent if we suppose the intention of the Constitution, according to the doctrine of the narrow school, to prohibit the use of paper money altogether to have been actually carried out—that there were no bills of credit emitted either by the States or the G

Equally forcible and of higher authority is the following from the opinion of Alexander Hamilton in reply to the questions as to the constitutionality of the act chartering the first Bank of the United States, submitted to his Cabinet by Washington. That Washington accepted this view is proved by the fact that he signed the bill.

Money is the very hinge on which commerce turns. And this does not mean merely gold and silver; many other things have served the purpose with different degrees of utility. Paper has been extensively employed. It cannot, therefore, be admitted that the regulation of trade between the States as it concerns the medium of circulation and exchange ought to be considered as confined to coin. It is even supposable that the whole or the greatest part of the coin of the country might be carried out of it.

The gentleman said:

The gentleman said:

With the strain of our public credit and the doubts and vicissitudes of the strug gle these notes had fallen far below par in gold, and it became apparent to every clear-headed observer that the continued issue of legal-tenders, with no provision for their redemption and no limit to their amount, would utterly destroy the credit of the Government and involve the Union cause in irretrievable disaster. But at that moment the military situation, with its perils and its prospects, was such that the Government must have money more rapidly than the sale of bonds could furnish it, and the danger was that the sale of bonds would be stopped altogether unless some definite limit could be assigned to the issue of legal-tender notes. Accordingly, Congress sought, and successfully sought, to accomplish both ends at the same time, and they passed a bill granting one hundred millions additional legal-tender circulation—making four hundred millions in all—and then incorporated in the same law a solemn assurance and pledge that "the total amount of United States notes, issued and to be issued, shall never exceed $400,000,000."

This paragraph presents a stranger of the structure of tender to the same and a property of the same tender.

been artificially appreciated, and ascribes the rise to the depreciation of the lawful money of the country, which was the standard of value for all exchanges of commodities and payments except those of duties on imports and interest on Government bonds. It must, I freely admit, have been apparent to every clear-headed observer that the "continued issue of legal tenders, with no provision for their redemption and no limit to their amount, would utterly destroy the credit of the Government." But, sir, Congress had provided that the notes should be redeemed by their receivability in exchange at par for 6 per cent. bonds; and the gentleman must know that so long as they were thus convertible into interest-bearing bonds they remained almost or quite at par with gold, and that it was the action of the Government repudiating this pledge and while refusing to receive them for customs duties demanding gold in payment thereof, that imparted an artificial value to gold and precluded the possibility of its use as a standard by which to measure the price of land or commodities. But by what enactment did Congress add another hundred millions to the volume of legal-tenders, which made four hundred millions in all, and incorporate therein the solemn assurance and pledge that the total amount of United States notes issued and to be issued should never exceed $400,000,000 ? I have been unable to discover it. It certainly was not brought to the attention of the Supreme Court in the famous case of The Banks vs. The Supervisors, reported in 7 Wallace, for in delivering the opinion in that case the Chief Justice, who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time all of the acts relating to the subject were passed, says:

The act of February 26, 1862, provided for the issue of these notes to the amount of $150,000,000; the act of July 11, 1862, provided for another $150,000,000 to the circulation, reserving, however, $50,000,000 for the redemption of temporary loans to be issued and used only when necessary for that purpose. Under the act of March 3, 1863, another issue of $150,000,000 was authorized, making the whole amount authorized $450,000,000.

Nor does the Treasury Department appear to have been aware of the fact that the volume of legal-tender notes was limited to $400,000,000, for Hon. William A. Richardson, who was subsequently Secretary of the Treasury in 1872, while yet Acting Assistant Secretary, published a volume of "practical information" concerning the public debt of the United States, by reference to page 39 of which I find that the amount of legal-tenders in actual circulation, including demandances, reached its highest point about August 31, 1865, when it was $433,160,569, and that it was first reduced below $400,000,000 on September 1, 1865. tember 1, 1866.

Again the gentleman said:

Again the gentieman said:

A lesson might be learned (by those willing to be taught by fact and experience) from the course of events during the war. When we had one hundred and fifty millions of legal-tender in circulation, it stood for a long while nearly at par with gold. As the issue increased in amount the depreciation was very rapid, and at the time we fixed the four-hundred-million limit, that whole vast sum had less purchasing power in exchange for lands, or houses, or merchandise than the hundred and fifty millions had two years before. In the spring of 1862, $150,000,000 of legal-tender would buy in the market $147,000,000 in gold coin. In June, 1864, $400,000,000 of legal-tender would buy only $140,000,000 in gold coin.

if we had not fixed the $400,000,000 limit * * * the legal-tender, with all its vast capacity for good in a great national crisis, would have taken its place in history alongside of the French assignat and the Continental currency. The four-hundred-million limit happily saved us that direful experience, and at once caused the legal-tender to appreciate.

What a strange confusion of fact and fancy we have here? The greenback was only saved from the fate of French assignats by the force of a limitation which did not exist, and was in fact largely exceeded. The divergence between the purchasing power of the greenback as applied to gold, the value of which had been artificially enhanced by our unwise, if not unhallowed, legislation, is applied to lands, houses, and merchandise; and, without investigating the facts of the case, but assuming that they must accord with his preconceived theories, the gentleman gives us statements of the purchasing power of the legal-tender which, but for our regard for him, would be laughed to scorn in view of the facts of history. Sir, I affirm, without the fear of successful contradiction, that neither the alleged depreciation of legal-tender money nor the actual appreciation of gold had a perceptible effect upon the market price of land or domestic merchandise in any part of our country. In particular localities special causes may at the time have raised the price of land and houses, but every dealer in real estate throughout the country will confirm the allegation that the fluctuations of the gold market had at no time an appreciable effect upon the price of real estate. How was it with merchandise and commodities? Notwithstanding the glowing assertion of the gentleman as to the increase in the price demanded and paid for them, as the result of a depreciation of our legal-tender paper money, I affirm that he does not believe it; that he did not believe it when preparing his speech; that, on the contrary, he knew that such was not the case. I do not charge him with conscious misrepresentation, for he is incap-His preconceived theory required the facts to be as he stated, and he assumed that they must be so. On this point let me bring to his attention an authority that he will accept as absolutely conclusive. If he will turn to the preceding page of his remarks, page 20 of the RECORD, he will find that he had just said:

And those honest-minded people who recall the startling activity of trade and the large profits during the war, and attribute both to an inflated currency, commit the error of leaving out the most important element of the calculation. They forget that the Government was a customer for nearly four years at the rate of two to three millions of dollars per day—buying countless quantities of all staple articles; they forget that the number of consumers was continually enlarging as our armed force grew to its gigantic proportions, and that the number of producers was by the same cause continually growing less, and that thus was presented, on a scale of unprecedented magnitude, that simple problem, familiar alike to the political economist and the village trader, of the demand being greater than the supply, and a consequent rise in the price. Had the Government been able to conduct the war on a gold basis and provide the coin for its necessarily large and lavish expenditure, a rise in the price of labor and a rise in the value of commodities would have been inevitable. And the rise of both labor and commodities in gold would have been for the time as marked as in paper.

Yes, the gentleman was correct in saying the rise of the prices of labor and commodities in gold would, under the circumstances, have been for the time as marked as in paper. He then saw that it was the law of supply and demand, and not the volume or the quality of our money, that so increased the price of merchandise. And I pause here to ask whether, if the million of laborers who are now wasting their lives in involuntary idleness were permitted to work at their respective avocations, their wages would not pay for and their consumption create a demand as great as that created by the war? But was it the four-hundred-million limit or any other limit that saved the legal tenders from perishing like French assignats and Continental money ! The law limiting the volume of legal-tenders to $450,000,000, fifty mill-March 3, 1863; and, as I have shown, the volume of legal-tenders to $450,000,000,000, fifty millions of which were to be held in reserve for emergencies, was approved March 3, 1863; and, as I have shown, the volume of legal-tender notes steadily increased until about August 31, 1865, and stood for a year thereafter above $400,000,000. The volume outstanding on the 30th of June of each of the years I shall refer to in order to test this question, as stated in the report of the Treasurer of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, which I have before me, was:

ĺ	June 30, 1863	$411, 223, 045
1	June 30, 1864	649, 094, 073
1	June 30, 1865	698, 918, 800

These figures, it will be perceived, confirm the statement of Mr. Richardson that the volume of legal-tender notes in circulation continued to increase until August, 1865.

Now, sir, let us bring to the test of experience the theory of the gentleman that the price of all commodities, including gold, was regulated by the volume of legal-tenders in circulation. It will not be difficult to apply the test, for the Bankers' Almanac gives us the price alment to apply the test, for the Bankers Almanac gives us the price of gold on every day of each of the years to be referred to, and shows that its range was vastly lower during the year 1865, when the volume of legal-tenders was at its maximum, than it had been in 1864 or was in 1866, after Mr. McCulloch's scheme of resuming specie payments by contracting the lawful money of the country had been inaugurated. In order that gentlemen may study these facts I will hand to the reporters for insertion an exhibit showing the premium on gold in Now York for the weather of the Law Luke Argust Sentember. York for the months of June, July, August, September, and October of the years 1864, 1865, and 1866. During July, 1864, the premium ranged at from 1662 to 185; in July, 1866, from 47 to 552, while in the same month of 1865 it reached 45 on but one day during the first twenty-six days of August. In 1864 it never sank so low as 150 during the entire month of August. In 1866 it dropped for but one hour as low as 46½, and its general range was from 47½ to 52½. During the month of August, 1865, when, as I have said, the legal-tender money of the country was at its maximum, it but once, and for a few minutes only, sold up to 45½, with no other sale that was not below 45.

The gentleman, while disclaiming the championship of the national The gentleman, while disclaiming the championship of the national banks, defended the system and spoke of "its strength and solvency in time of financial disaster." I invite his attention to the fact that when the contraction of the money of the country brought on the disaster of September, 1873, the national banks were the first chartered institutions to succumb; that, while they were contracting their loans and ruining those customers who had borrowed their credit on marketable securities by sacrificing their collaterals, they were refusing to redeem their own notes in greenbacks or to return even in their own notes in denositors the sums they had denosited with them. Does be notes to depositors the sums they had deposited with them. Does he not remember that, when holding, as they did, many hundreds of millions of deposits, they refused to pay any part of this vast confidential indebtedness, and handed to depositors certificates of indebtedness, by the sale of which, at discounts ranging from 4 to 8 per cent., they could obtain money with which to redeem the collaterals held by these same insolvent banks? The people remember these facts, and remember also that, while thus proclaiming their inability to meet their obligations, they, with sublime impudence, announced to the country, that they issued these depreciated certificates of indebtedness in order to prevent the Government from making a further emission of legal-tender money. Where was their strength and solvency in that time of financial disaster? Had there been no banknotes; had the currency of the country been, as it should always be, legal-tender money emitted by the Government, the men who sold the certificates of these greedy and mismanaged banks at various rates of discount would have been saved the sacrifice inflicted upon them by the corporate consumers of the profits that should reward labor and well-directed enterprise.

Very far from making a fair statement of the position of those he denounces as inflationists is the gentleman when he speaks of "the confusion, the distress, the ruin that would result from forcing twenty-one hundred banks suddenly to wind up their affairs with nearly $1,000,000,000 due them." "The commercial fabric," says he, "rests $1,000,000,000 due them." "The commercial fabric," says he, "rests upon the bank crédits, and nothing short of financial lunacy would demand their rude disturbance." Who, I ask, would rudely disturb the banks? Not I or any of the million of republicans who sympathize with me on this question of currency and finance. We do not believe that their existence depends on the profit they make on circulation? Does the gentleman mean to imply that they are so weak that, if the profit on circulation be withdrawn, they must suddenly wind up and go into bankruptcy or liquidation? Do they not assure us that the profit on circulation is an inconsiderable that to induce them to maintain it. circulation is so inconsiderable that to induce them to maintain it we must repeal certain taxes now imposed on them? Does not the Comptroller of the Currency tell us that to the banks of large cities the privilege of issuing notes is without value, and that many of them the privilege of issuing notes is without value, and that many of them have refused to put the notes to which they were entitled into circulation? Has it been, I ask the gentleman, from profits on circulation that the banks have added $131,000,000 of surplus to their capital while making large semi-annual dividends, and some of them occasionally making a dividend of 100 per cent.? The idea is preposterous, as preposterous as it is to suggest, as the gentleman does, that, if a like number of greenbacks of like denominations should be gradually substituted for national-bank notes, the process would so inflate the currency that the banks would refuse to convert their bonds into lawful money for banking numbers.

The plan I and my colaborers suggest could produce no shock, and could not inflate the currency. It is this: The United States Treasury is the redemption agency for the banks, and we would have it retain all bank-notes that come in until those of any bank should reach the amount of $900, when, instead of returning its notes to the bank, the Treasurer should carry to the books and vaults of the Treasury $900 in legal-tender notes of like denominations with the bank-notes canceled and destroyed, and return to the bank instead of $900 in its notes $1,000 in its bonds deposited to secure the payment of its notes. Thus would the Government assume its prerogative of issuing the money of the country without disturbing the business of any bank, banker, or merchant in the country. The operation would neither inflate nor contract the currency, but would withhold from those who are rich enough to own and deposit bonds the special privilege of dividing with the Government its highest prerogative, that of coining money and regulating the value thereof, and the $20,000,000 in gold now paid them for exercising the privilege.

In referring to the crisis of 1873, the gentleman attributed it to the number expansion of credit. In this be was right; but, indeping from undue expansion of credit. In this he was right; but, judging from the general spirit of his remarks, I am inclined to think that in this particular he "builded better than he knew." It was the undue expansion of credit consequent upon a contraction of the lawful money of the country that gave room for the inflation of private credit and brought on the crisis of 1873.

Mr. Speaker, nothing is taught with more constant reiteration by the experience of England and the United States, than that a protracted contraction of the money of a country is the sure precursor of wild inflation of private credit. The most recent illustration of this law, as inflexible as that of gravitation, is furnished by the course of events in this country between 1865 and 1873. In the former year we events in this country between 1865 and 1873. In the former year we had about two thousand millions of money. It was inconvertible. It was not all in the form of currency. We had, as I have shown, but a little more than four hundred and thirty-three millions of demand and legal-tender notes, but, as appears by the Treasurer's report for 1873, to which I have already referred, we had compound-interest notes, one-year notes, two years' notes, two years' coupon-notes, all of which were made legal-tender by the acts authorizing their issue; and we had other obligations which the banks were allowed to hold as reserve, and which, therefore, enabled them to keep the entire body of every form of circulating medium in operation. Private credit was then so contracted that commercial paper failed to afford employment to the funds of the banks, one-half of their available resources was invested in various forms of Government loans, and they held oneinvested in various forms of Government loans, and they held onefourth of our national debt, keeping the interest thereon payable at home and to our own people. The farms, factories, workshops, and homes of the country were then freer from mortgage and judgment debt than they had ever been. Suits at law upon direct contract to pay money, such as on promissory notes, drafts, and checks, were of rare occurrence. By furnishing the people with an available medium of exchange the Government had stimulated production, cash payments had taken the place of credit, and the business of the country was on a sound basis. But as the Government withdrew the legaltender money before a favorable balance of trade or any agency of the Government could substitute metallic money therefor, cash payments became impracticable, the use of private credit increased and ments became impracticable, the use of private credit increased, and a crisis became inevitable; the only question being, when will it occur? In the remarks I had the honor to make to the House January 10, 1874, in support of my interconvertible-bond bill, I illustrated the invariable law that the expansion of private credit always ensues upon a contraction of the money of a country, by reference to the condition of the banks of New York from 1865 to 1873 inclusive. Permit me to invite your attention to a part of what I then said:

Sir, I invite the attention of gentlemen to a table which is most significant on this point. It is a table of the loans and discounts, the capital and surplus, the individual deposits, and the legal-tender reserves of the national banks on the 1st of October in each year, from October, 1865, to September 12, 1873. In 1865 the loans and discounts were $487,000,000 and the legal-tender reserve was $189,000,000. In 1873, the $487,000,000 of loans and discounts had swollen to $944,000,000 and the reserve had shrunk from $189,000,000 to $113,000,000. Thus it is shown that as you contract the money you enslave labor and enterprise, consolidate capital, and raise the rates of interest, building, as I said, an inverted pyramid, which, sooner or later, must topple, involving all in destruction. But let the figures tell their own story:

Year.	Loans and discounts.	Capital and surplus.	Individual deposits.	Legal-tender reserve.
1865		$431, 970, 586	$549, 081, 254	$189, 988, 496
1866		468, 638, 246 486, 769, 002	597, 960, 993 568, 212, 337	205, 770, 641 157, 439, 099
1868		498, 620, 272	603, 084, 550	156, 047, 205
1869		502, 554, 485,	523, 029, 491	129, 564, 295 122, 669, 577
1870 1871		524, 460, 740 559, 368, 367	512, 765, 708 626, 774, 021	134, 489, 735
1872	872, 520, 104	589, 886, 660	625, 708, 307	118, 971, 104
1873	944, 220, 116	611, 387, 115	622, 685, 563	113, 132, 662

Gentlemen will do well to examine other features of this table than those to which I then referred. They will notice that in 1865 the condition of the business men of the country was so prosperous that while the loans and discounts of the banks amounted to but $487,000,000 they held individual deposits to the amount of $549,000,000; the deposits of individuals exceeded the loans and discounts by $62,000,000, and the legal-tender reserve was about $190,000,000.

Reference to the same columns for 1873 shows that the loans had very nearly doubled, being then $944,000,000; that individual deposits, not withstanding this great increase of discounts, were but $622,000,000, and that the legal-tender reserve had with this vast increase of responsibility on the part of the banks shrunk from $190,000,000 to $113,000,000. The crisis was not, as the gentleman would have us believe, the result of a full volume of paper money. It was, as I have said, the result of the undue inflation of corporate and individual credit, which inflation was the inevitable result of a protracted contraction of a volume of money to which the business of the country had adjusted itself. He said we are suffering from "one of those periodical revulsions in trade common to all commercial nations, and which thus far no wisdom of legislation has been able to avert." The remark is too broad. It is not true of all commercial nations. Those periodical revulsions have been confined to Great Britain and the United States, and result in each country from the Government restricting the volume of money and forcing business men to trade on private credit. France has never been subject to such periodical revulsions, and Germany is now for the first time experiencing one as the result of her reckless demonetization of silver and her suppression of all bank-notes for less than £5 or $25 in order to bring gold into use. Caught by the glittering plausibilities of schoolmen and abstract thinkers, she has attempted to improve the quality of her money, the mere tool of trade, and has so disturbed and contracted the legal money of the empire that her industries are as prostrate as our own, her revenues fall off, and her laboring people for the first time know what those of Great Britain and America suffer under the periodical revulsions consequent upon the collapse of inflated credit.

That was an unfortunate reference the gentleman made to California. He held her up as an example of prosperity to be envied by the suffering people of her sister-States, and ascribed her prosperity to her repudiation and nullification of the legal-tender law. Sir, it may be an act of temerity, but I am prepared to present her as a warning to those citizens of other States who believe that by contracting the volume of money they can promote the welfare of the people or hasten the day when prosperity shall again dwell within our borders. In natural gifts and geographical position California excels any other State of the Union. In abundance, variety, value, and accessibility her resources exceed those of any other State or nation. She is as accessible by ocean voyage to Caucasian emigrants as are the island provinces of England. She is by rail within six days of the cities of the East, crowded with skilled and aspiring workmen. She is the exclusive American producer of quicksilver, her mines of cinnabar being many and rich. I need not refer to her wealth in gold and silver or her production of wheat, wine, and wool. The world knows how great it is, for it enters as a distinct item into national statistics. In recent years her lands have yielded unusually large crops per acre of superior tobacco, and in the Merced and other valleys cotton is now grown with profit. She has the only great deposit of tin, that of San Bernardino, yet discovered on this continent, and is not without coal, copper, and iron. She has lakes of borax, mountains of sulphur, and produces the fruits of the world, growing strawberries in the open air more than nine months in the year. Her climate is as healthful and delicious as that of Sicily, of which she is an enlarged and improved edition. No other State presents so many or such great attractions, yet measured by all that makes the true greatness of a State she is one of the least progressive of the American sisterhood. Shunned by men of enterprise whose capital is limited, her wealth does n country by acquiring homes or land, so that there, among the golden sands and verdant fields of California, is the land owned by a few capitalists and the labor performed by homeless wanderers. Do I exaggerate the picture? Let facts speak.

Let me compare her with States of her own age who are almost absolutely without mineral resources, whose summers are brief, whose winters long and severe, whose farms lie nearly two thousand miles from the seaboard, the profit on whose products is greatly reduced by the immense cost of bringing them to market, and the cost of the manufactured articles they consume enhanced by the fact that they have to traverse the same long lines of transportation. Let me compare California with Iowa, Wisconsin, or Minnesota. In order to do this justly, we must bear in mind the fact that California was admitted to the Union September 9, 1850; that Iowa, having been admitted December 28, 1846, had preceded her not quite four years; that Wisconsin was admitted May 29, 1848, preceding her a little more than two years, and that Minnesota was admitted May 11, 1858, and is therefore nearly eight years her junior. How do these purely agricultural and almost hyperborean States compare in all that constitutes the true greatness of a State with their more richly endowed and happily located sister? The extent of her territory is vastly greater than that of any of them, yet the census of 1870 shows her population to have been but 582,031, of whom 49,310 were Chinese; while Iowa, four years her senior, had a population of 1,064,985, and Minnesota, nearly eight years her junior, was nearly her equal in population, having 446,056.

Time will not permit me to run a parallel between her and each of these States. To make the contrast with Iowa or Wisconsin would present differences so striking and immense that they would stagger credulity. I therefore take Minnesota, the youngest—eight years, or nearly one-third younger than she—and the most remote from the seaboard, the one also which stretches farthest into the wintry north, whose boundary is the northern boundary of the country, and whose season for the growth and gathering of crops is limited to half the year. The area of California is 188,918 square miles, and that of Minnesota 83,000. In 1860 California had 379,994 inhabitants and Minnesota but 172,023; the increase in California for the succeeding ten years was but 190,223, while that of Minnesota was 274,033, which is 83,810 in excess of the increase of California, which started into the decade with more than 100 per cent. in advance. The assessed wealth of California was, in 1860, $139,654,667, and in 1870 it was $269,644,068; an increase of a little more than 90 per cent. The assessed value in Minnesota in 1860 was over $32,000,000, and in 1870 over $84,000,000; an increase of over 160 per cent. The assessed value of real estate in California in 1860 was over $66,000,000, and in 1870 was over $176,000,000, showing an increase in real estate of over $109,000,000, leaving but about $20,000,000 to evidence the increase of every other species of property. The assessed value of real estate in Minnesota in 1860 was over $25,000,000, and in 1870 over $62,000,000; showing an increase of personal property of over 220 per cent. The indebtedness of California exceeds that of Minnesota by over $15,000,000. The taxes paid in Minnesota in 1870 were $2,646,372 in legal-tender money, being $5,217,734 less than were paid in California, and the number of children in attendance in the wintry State of the Northwest was 5,513 in excess of those attending in the genial climate of California. Minnesota had 234 more churches than California, fewer convict

How, Mr. Speaker, are we to account for these startling contrasts? Climate, soil, natural productions, geographical position, all favor California. Why is she thus laggard in the race for civic supremacy? It is because she has preferred to maintain as money a currency composed of a commodity which other nations need, and the volume of which cannot increase in a debtor State or nation, and thus to make all enterprise depend on the use of private credit; has maintained a monetary system by means of which they who lend credit absorb the sweat of the laborer's brow, together with the results of all productive industries. California rejected our national system of money, which, though called into being by the exigencies of the war, was, as I have shown, abundantly authorized by the terms of the Constitution, and in doing so deprived herself of that agency—a cheap, safe, and inexportable medium of exchange—which made the progress in wealth and all the blessings attendant upon wealth, churches, schools, galleries of art, improved means of transportation, and other commercial facilities throughout the North and East more remarkable than had ever taken place in any decade in the history of this or any other country. Who, in view of these facts, will claim that metallic money has been a blessing to California?

The gentleman's allusion to the patriots of 1790 led me to another investigation, which proved to be as unfortunate for his cause as his reference to California, as it also established the impossibility of a debtor community transacting business with gold and silver or paper instantly convertible into gold and silver as its medium of exchange. He said:

The patriots of 1790, with their slender resources, did not hesitate to assume a national debt of $90,000,000, being more than one-seventh of their entire possessions; and it never occurred to them that an abandonment of the specie basis would make their burden lighter. They knew from their terrible experience with continental currency that all their evils would be painfully increased by a resort to paper money. And in their poverty, with no accumulated capital, with manufactures in feeblest infancy, with commerce undeveloped, with low prices for their agricultural products, they maintained the gold and silver standard, they paid their great debt, they grew rich in the property which we inherited, but far richer in that bright, unsullied honor which they also bequeathed to us.

Is the gentleman sure they did not resort to paper money? Let us be. They had not gold and silver enough for carrency, and without see. They had not gold and silver enough for currency, and without a medium of exchange society was impossible. If they could not have gold or silver they must have some other medium of exchange, and they resorted to bank-notes as a substitute for money. They made the experiment of a specie-basis bank system. The New England States were especially liberal in granting charters to banks, providing, however, in each case that the capital should be paid in full in specie, and that the banks should always retain a sufficient amount of specie in their vaults to secure the prompt convertibility of the notes they might issue. vaults to secure the prompt convertibility of the notes they might issue. All the legal provisions that ingenuity and their past experience of the evils of paper currency could suggest were embodied in the charters of the banks as safeguards of the currency. Yet the capital was not paid up in specie, nor were any of the banks able to obtain and keep specie enough to give convertibility to their notes, and the consequence was that in 1809–'10 the people of New England suffered anew a collapse of the currency, on the solvency of which their business and estates depended almost as absolute as that which had occurred with Continental money. I have upon my person a five-dollar note of the Farmers' Exchange Bank of Gloucester, Rhode Island, dated July 1, 1808. When the general insolvency occurred this bank, with scores of others, became the subject of legislative investigation, in the course of which it was ascertained that, with over six gation, in the course of which it was ascertained that, with over six hundred thousand of notes in circulation, it had $86.45 in specie in its vaults. The Coos Bank of New Hampshire was without any specie, though its notes were as abundant as the leaves of the forest. Of the Berkshire and Northampton Bank, both of Massachusetts, it is reported that when their vaults were examined one had thirty or forty dollars in it and the other was entirely empty. And, in the discussion in Congress upon the bill to charter a bank of the United States for the purpose of supplying the people with money by making its notes legal-tender in payment of all dues to the Government, and thus imparting to them the quality of general acceptability, it was stated that legislative inquiry had established the fact that in all the banks of Massachusetts there was not specie enough to redeem the notes of one of them. And, sir, I affirm that it will ever be thus while the Govrnment fails to exercise its prerogative of furnishing the legal-tender money of the country, regulating its value and providing for its redeemability by its receipt for all dues of any nature whatsoever to the Government itself and in exchange for any and all interest-bearing obligations it may issue.

But I am trespassing upon the patience of the House; yet before closing I must say that the maintenance of a monetary system of which goldshall be the basis has become impossible to any but the leading creditor nations of the world. France, England, and Germany may maintain such a system in a qualified measure, but no other country maintain such a system in a quained measure, but no other country can. The mines of all the world do not yield gold enough to serve the single purpose of paying the annual interest on the bonded debts of nations, the greater part of which are held by the people of the countries I have named. They have thus become a great reservoir of bullion, the supply-pipe of which is proving to be a fatal exhaust-pipe to all debtor countries that use metallic money or base their paper currency upon gold or silver.

The bonded debt of the nations of the world, apart from municipal and corporate debts is now over $4.200,000,000, apart from municipal and corporate debts is now over $4.200,000,000, apart from municipal and corporate debts is now over $4.200,000,000.

and corporate debts, is now over £4,200,000,000 or $21,000,000,000, the interest on which is payable in gold at various rates, from that paid by Holland, which is but 2\frac{3}{2} per cent., to that of 18 per cent. which is promised by Mexico. Already something more than a score of states or nations, including those of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] spoke the other day as the "miserable republics of South America," have declared their bankruptcy by avowing their inability to meet the interest on their bonds. The indebtedness of these bank-States and nations amounts to £238,586,476, of which over rupt States and nations amounts to £235,886,476, of which over £160,000,000 are due from Spain and over £5,000,000 from Greece.

If gentlemen wish to examine the details of this indebtedness and the rate of its progress during the last decade they will find it set forth with a good measure of completeness in Britain A. Hill's recent work entitled Absolute Money. The facts are terribly suggestive of the thought that the bursting of the bubble of national credit may soon overshadow the interest attached to the collapse of John Law's

In legislating on this vital subject gentlemen should remember that it is the productive industry of the people that enriches a nation and replenishes its treasury; that it is labor, and not coin, that maintains the frame-work of society and supports the public credit; and that whatever stimulates societary motion and facilitates exchanges of commodities promotes the welfare of the people and enables them to contribute to the strength and revenues of the Government.

By contracting our money we have contracted production re-

By contracting our money we have contracted production, re-stricted consumption, impoverished the people, and reduced the public revenues. Under the statutory threat of forced resumption, which the gentleman would intensify, capital shrinks from investment in any form or character of productive industry, and seeks safety and profit in untaxed securities of the Government. Values continue to shrink. Business is conducted at a loss and taxes are paid, not out of current profits, as they should be, but out of principal. Each day consumes the substance of the people, and we are traveling, not toward the resumption of specie payments, not toward a favorable balance or trade, but toward individual, corporate, and national bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. J. W. Schuckers, who was confidential secretary to Salmon P. Chase during his administration of the finances of the country, published about a year ago a pamphlet entitled "The Finances, Panics, and Specie Payments," with the motto, "Facts speak." It contains many instructive bits of history, with sage deductions therefrom, and in conclusion, borrowing my language from this little work, I say to the House, as I said to my constituents on the 15th of May last, when promising to carry the agitation for currency reform into last, when promising to carry the agitation for currency reform into every hamlet of Pennsylvania, "That the party, democratic or repub-lican, or whatever its name, which forces resumption of specie pay-ments prior to the practical extinction of the national debt, whether that be in ten years or thirty, will be trampled to death under the feet of the people. Let the future political history of the country be witness as to this!" [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

During the remarks of Mr. Kelley, when the hour expired, Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, said: I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. Kelley] be permitted such additional time as may be necessary to enable him to conclude his remarks.

There was no objection, and the remarks, as above given, were con-

PRESIDENTIAL TERM OF OFFICE.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to thank my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] for moving a reconsideration of the vote by which the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution was defeated.

The debate which followed the introduction of this question showed a remarkable unanimity of opinion among members on both sides of the House in favor of some change by which the presidential term of office, and the eligibility to re-election, would be limited. There are some who, while voting for a change in one form or another, regard the matter with considerable indifference. To me it is, and has long been, a question of very great importance to the future welfare of the country. I am not in favor of amending or enlarging the Constitu-tion in any respect until the necessity for so doing is clearly apparent. It is not enough to secure my assent that a proposed amendment may be beneficial; it must be made to appear that the failure to make the change will be attended with evil.

In view of the discussion which has been carried on during the past year concerning the re-election of the present incumbent of the office to serve for a longer term than any of his predecessors, and in view of the evil results which are likely to follow from familiarizing the eople with such an idea unless some check to its accomplishment is interposed, the present time seems specially favorable for securing intelligent action upon this question.

In the remarks which were made when the reports of the Judiciary Committee were first presented, the opinions of the founders of the Republic were quoted in support of the proposition that the President should not be eligible to re-election for an indefinite number of times. It appears that the foremost men in the convention which framed the Constitution were in great doubt as to the number of years which should constitute the presidential term, and also as to the expediency of making the incumbent eligible to re-election. And at one time it was resolved that the chief executive should be elected by the national legislature for a term of seven years, and should forever thereafter be ineligible. Finally, a committee of revision agreed upon a term of four years, saying nothing about a re-election, and that was adopted by the convention as a compromise between some who were in favor of making the tenure for life dependent only on good behavior, and others who favored a short term with ineligibility to reelection. How Jefferson regarded the dangers likely to follow the unrestricted exercise of the right of re-election has been shown by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] who submitted the majority report in favor of a single term of four years, and by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] who introduced an independent proposition to prevent a re-election for a third term.

And in this connection it may be well to refer to a report made in the session of 1825-'26 by a committee of the Senate, of which Benton was chairman, appointed to inquire into the expediency of reducing executive patronage. The recommendations made by that committee may still have their use, as Benton says in his Thirty Years View, in "showing the demonstration of the demonstra in "showing the democratic principles on practical points of that day, (when some of the fathers of the democratic church were still among us,) and in recalling the administration of the Government to the simplicity and economy of its early days." It is stated in the report that at the time the Constitution was adopted "the feebleness of the that at the time the Constitution was adopted "the feebleness of the old Confederation had excited a much greater dread of anarchy among the members than of power in the head." And the committee go on to say that they believe they will be acting in the spirit of the Constitution in laboring to multiply the guards, and strengthen the barriers, against the possible abuse of power. The patronage of the Federal Government at the beginning was founded upon a revenue of two millions of dollars; at the time the report was made it was operating upon twenty-two millions.

At the time the distinguished Frenchman, De Toequeville, was studying the institutions of this country, and collecting the facts from which ing the institutions of this country, and collecting the facts from which he afterward produced that remarkable work on Democracy in America, the annual revenue of the Government was scarcely more than $25,000,000 and the expenditures did not exceed $15,000,000—a condition of things which actually gave less patronage to the national Executive than is held to-day by the mayors of several cities in this country. What were the views of that experienced and impartial observer upon this question of executive patronage and the right of continued re-election to office? I will read a brief extract from his work:

Intrigue and corruption are vices natural to elective governments. But when the chief of the government can be re-elected those vices extend indefinitely and compromise even the existence of the country. When a simple candidate seeks success by intrigue his maneuvers can operate only over a circumseribed space. When, on the contrary, the chief of the government himself enters the ranks of candidates he borrows for his own proper use the force of the government. In the first case it is one man with his feeble means; in the second, it is the government itself, with its immense resources, which intrigues and corrupts. * * * It is impossible to consider the ordinary course of affairs in the United States without perceiving that the desixe to be re-elected dominates the thoughts of the President; that all the policy of his administration tends to this point; that his least movements are subordinated to this object; that in proportion as the moment of crisis approaches individual interest substitutes itself in his mind for the general interest.

It was at the same time that President Jackson repeatedly recommended, in his messages to Congress, that the Constitution should be so amended as to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of either four or six years. And Henry Clay, although opposed to Jackson on most political questions, agreed with him in urging the adoption of such an amendment. In a speech delivered in 1840 Clay

Much observation and deliberate reflection have satisfied me that too much of the time, the thoughts, and the exertions of the incumbent are occupied during the first term in securing his re-election. The public business consequently suffers.

To come down to a later day I may repeat the views of two statesmen whose long and distinguished services entitle them to especial consideration here. Benjamin F. Wade, just before retiring from the Senate in 1866, proposed an amendment of the Constitution confining the President to a single term, and said, in supporting it:

The offering of this resolution is no new inpulse of mine, for I have been an advocate of the principle contained in it for many years; and I have derived the strong impressions which I entertain on the subject from a very careful observation of the workings of our Government during a long period. I believe it has been very rare that we have been able to cleet a President who has not been tempted to use the vast powers intrusted to him according to his own opinions to advance his re-election. * * * There are defects in the Constitution, and this is among the most during. most glaring

In 1871 Charles Sumner advocated the same amendment, and said: For many years there has been an increasing conviction among the people, without distinction of party, that one wielding the vast patronage of the President should not be a candidate for re-election, and this conviction has found expression in the solemn warnings of illustrious citizens and in repeated propositions for an amendment of the Constitution confining the President to one term.

I might go much further in quoting the opinions of those who have taken a prominent part in the government of our country from its foundation in favor of restricting the presidential term. But I will not foundation in favor of restricting the presidential term. But I will not trespass upon your time. There is one strong reason for making the change proposed which has presented itself since the Constitution was adopted. It was intended that the electors chosen in the several States should meet unpledged and exercise their personal judgment in the choice of a Chief Magistrate. If this provision of the Constitution had been carried out in accordance with the purpose of those who framed it, we should have an important check upon the evil influences of executive patronage. Instead of that, to use the words of Benton, "anirresponsible body (chiefly self-constituted, and mainly dominated by professional office-seckers and office-holders) have usurped the election of President (for the nomination is the election so far as the party is concerned) and use it to their own profit in the so far as the party is concerned) and use it to their own profit in the monopoly of office and plunder."

Another reason for the change, and one which did not show itself until the Government had been in operation some years, is the introduction of what has been called the "spoils system."

In obedience to this system-

Says George William Curtis in his report to the President as chairman of the civil-service commission-man of the civil-service commission—the whole machinery of the Government is pulled to pieces every four years. Political caucuses, primary meetings, and conventions are controlled by the promise and the expectation of patronage. Political candidates for the lowest or the highest positions are directly or indirectly pledged. The pledge is the price of the nomination, and when the election is determined pledges must be redeemed. The business of the nation, the legislation of Congress, the duties of the Departments are all subordinated to the distribution of what is called "the spoils." No one escapes. President, Secretaries, Senators, Representatives, are dogged, besonght and denounced on the one hand to appoint, on the other to retain subordinates. The great officers of the Government are constrained to become mere office-brokers. Meantime they may have their own hopes, ambitions, and designs. They may strive to make their patronage secure their private aims. The spectacle is as familiar as it is painful and humiliating.

Upon the vicious and corrupting practice of assessing subordinates for political purposes, Mr. Curtis says:

As a part of the vast scheme of patronage, an officer who is appointed solely in deference to political pressure is judged not by the manner in which he does his duty, but by the zeal with which he serves the influence that secured his place. He is poorly paid, but a tax is levied upon his salary for the expenses of the party, and although it is called a voluntary contribution, he is made to understand that there are scores of applicants who would gladly take his place with every incumbrance, and he therefore pays from fear of possible removal. Thus it has become the practice of every party in power to seek to retain power by levying upon the money paid to the public agents for the public service.

Washington during his term of office removed only nine persons for merely personal reasons; John Adams removed but nine, none of them except for cause; Jefferson removed but thirty-nine; Madison only five; Monroe, nine; John Quincy Adams, two. These removals were of persons confirmed by the Senate. Until Jackson's time no members of the clerical force were removed except for cause. That President removed nearly two thousand persons in a single year, merely on partisan grounds; and the result evidently impressed him with the importance of limiting the terms of his successors.

If Randolph, Jefferson, Benton, Jackson, Harrison, Clay, Webster, and Chancellor Kent saw in their times the need of interposing some check to the exercise of the executive patronage in securing a continuance in office, how much greater does that necessity appear to-day, with a revenue of about $300,000,000 and a civil-service list which embraces about eighty thousand persons? I have made some investigations in regard to the number of Government employés, and in placing it at eighty thousand I know whereof I speak. Think of this army of eighty thousand men, composed largely of those who believe that the whole duty of a Government office-holder is to support the Adminthe whole duty of a Government office-holder is to support the Administration through good report and through evil report—especially through evil report—and it is not surprising that we begin to hear serious talk of a third term, and if this thing continues it will not be many years before we hear of a life term.

The power of the President over these office-holders, and his disponition.

sition to exercise it arbitrarily, has been shown in repeated instances; notably in the removal by President Jackson of William J. Duane, Secretary of the Treasury, for refusing to do what he considered an illegal act—the removal of the deposits from the United States Bank; and quite recently in the forced resignation of a Secretary of the Interior for refusing to allow the compulsory assessment, for political purposes, of officers in his Department. From the Secretary of the Treasury down to the night watchmen in the custom-houses every man feels the hand of the President upon him and knows that if he half rees the half of the resident dipli him and knows that if he fails at caucus or convention in bearing true allegiance to his chief he is liable to be discharged. That is the condition of the civil service to-day. I regret to say it, but I feel that it ought to be said. Now, what is the remedy? The removal of one great incentive to the exercise of arbitrary power on the part of the Executive is the limitation of the presidential office to a single term. I do not expect that that will do away with all abuse of executive patronage; but it must certainly do much to improve the present condition of the Government service.

And now in regard to the extent of the single term to which the President should be limited I have this to say: The interval between elections should be made as long as prudence would dictate to be safe. The evils attending our presidential elections are manifest. The business interests of the Government and the people are suffering to-day from the preparations for the approaching election and the uncertainty of the result. I am strongly of the opinion that the term suggested by the minority of the Judiciary Committee, namely, six years, is on many accounts the best; and I trust the sober second thought of the members on the other side of the House will coincide in that view. It corresponds with the term of service of members of the Senate, and beyond that time I do not think it would be wise to go. The term of seven years, which seemed to be in the minds of those who framed the Constitution, would not enable the President to enter upon his duties at the same time that members of a new House of Representatives are chosen to enter upon theirs.

As to the time when the amendment shall take effect, I will say frankly that my first impression was against the date named by the minority; but the very clear explanation given by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] of his reasons for designating the year 1885 has convinced me that the final success of the measure is largely dependent upon that point.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to speak for the toiling millions, but not in accord with my distinguished colleague from Philadelphia. I had hoped that the propriety of a resumption of specie payments at an early day and a preparation for resumption on January 1, 1879, had been acquiesced in by political parties because of the unmistakable wish of the people, which has been so often and so emphatically expressed.

The first act passed by Congress under the present Administration, in 1869, was an act to strengthen the public credit of the nation, by declaring that the bonded debt and legal-tenders were payable in gold, and that measures should be taken to establish an early resumption of specie payments. The democratic and republican national conventions of 1872 made declarations to a similar effect; and the voice of the people was most clearly made manifest during the recent State elections, and most notably in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

In these two States, the democratic party, reversing its frequently declared sentiments and antagonizing its long time Jacksonian and Bentonian traditions in favor of a hard money or convertible currency, placed itself in opposition to resumption, declared in favor of additional issues of legal-tenders and of the extinction of the national banking system, and the substitution of State banks in its stead. It went to the people on that issue. The merits of the question were discussed at every cross-roads store, in every district school-house, in town and county conventions, and after a thorough examination of the whole financial question the people declared in favor of a redeemable currency by a defeat of the democratic candidates for governor in the States just mentioned.

With such an emphatic declaration of public sentiment there should be no hesitation on the part of Congress as to its duty; and although some bills have been presented to the House based on the principles of those democratic platforms which, if passed, would defeat the will of the people thus expressed; yet believing from the vote on the Holman resolution and other indications that there is a majority in Congress having a determination to respect the popular will by providing for a resumption of specie payments sooner or later and furnishing the people with honest money, I desire to offer some suggestions as to the best method of providing for such resumption.

The act of 1875 provides for the redemption of the legal-tender notes of the Government after January 1, 1879. I opposed the passage of the bill for several reasons, among which were these: that it was pushed through the House under the operation of the previous question, thus cutting off nearly all debate and all opportunity of amendment; that it surrendered the sovereign prerogative of regu-lating the currency, to two thousand banks; that it provided for re-demption at a single place in this wide nation and on sums not less than $50, thus making it a bankers and brokers' and not a poor man's than $50, thus making it a bankers and brokers and not a poor man's redemption; and because it was so imperfect that it could not be executed without other legislation than that which it contained.

The correctness of my views stands confirmed in the fact that both the President and Secretary of the Treasury have recognized its deficiencies and recommended that they be supplied.

Notwithstanding my original objections, as an opportunity now occurs, and as a disposition is now manifested to carry out the spirit if not the letter of the law, and the time of redemption has been fixed and great masses of the people are turning their minds toward doing their part in effecting that result, I will earnestly oppose any post-ponement of the time already named, and will advocate any means that will aid in the contemplated redemption. I propose, therefore, to offer some suggestions as to the measures which seem to me to be necessary to effectuate the intention of the act of 1875.

In considering the best means of restoring the currency of the Government to a specie basis we should first ascertain the obstacles in the way of resumption, and afterward the most appropriate methods for their removal.

The first great obstacle, in my judgment, lies in the depreciation of the legal-tenders. This arises from several causes. In 1854, toward the close of the war, the legal-tenders had depreciated until they were worth only forty cents in the dollar. This arose from the doubt in the minds of capitalists and the people whether the Government would be able to suppress the rebellion, and whether it would not have to make, under sheer necessity, a still further issue of legal-tenders. This doubt, however, ceased with the surrender of Lee, in April, 1865, and the greenbacks rose and fluctuated in that month between sixty-two cents and seventy cents in value, expressed in gold. With the removal of that doubt, however, there still remained the distrust that the enormous debt imposed upon us by the war would be too heavy for the nation to bear, and that the taxation necessary even to keep down the interest would be so onerous as eventually to result in re-

The rehabilitation of the rebellious States to their original political position in the nation; their appearance in Congress by their Senators and Representatives, who have sworn allegiance anew to the Constitution and declared that hereafter they want but a common flag, a common nation, and a common destiny, aided by a taxamon flag, a common nation, and a common destiny, aided by a taxation that has made manifest the wonderful resources of the people, enhanced still further the value of the legal-tenders, until, in 1870, they rose in value to eighty-three cents in gold.

The great recuperative powers of the Government, by which we paid off five hundred millions of public indebtedness in a very few years, established our credit among the nations of the world and enabled the Secretary of the Treasury to reduce $500,000,000 of the 6 per cent. bonds to 5 per cents, thus saving five millions in interest annually, and enhanced the value of the legal-tender dollar to eightynine cents, where, with a few fluctuations upward or downward, it has remained for the last four or five years.

All doubt of the perpetuity of the nation having been removed, and

All doubt of the perpetuity of the nation having been removed, and All doubt of the perpetuity of the nation having been removed, and the credit of the bonded debt being above par in gold, two elements of discredit have been eliminated from the problem, and there can only remain one other reason for the depreciation of the greenback, and that is its superabundance or redundancy. This is evident from several facts, among which are these, that the bonds of the Government are above par as just stated, while the unimpeachable credit and eventual ability of the Government to redeem the legal-tenders are insufficient to keep them at par. As they form, in common with bank-notes and bank deposits, the current means of every day's business transactions, and are influenced by them, they must be considered in connection therewith.

In 1861 the legal-tenders, bank-notes, and deposits amounted to seven hundred and nine millions, or $21.81 per capita; in 1866 those items were increased to twelve hundred and sixty-two millions, or $35.31 per capita; in 1875 they were increased to fourteen hundred and fifty-six millions, or, as population had increased rapidly, they amounted to $33.10 per capita. All this was independent of the deposits of savings-banks and State banks, which amounted to thirteen hundred and forty-six millions in the latter year; and as these were also mostly payable on demand or at short notice, it would swell the amount of ready and available cash or its equivalent to a per capita rate of $63.70—a larger rate of ready money to the individual than could be found in any other nation of the world. Add to all this the fact that there is now lying idle in the Treasury and in the national banks, over and above their reserve, the sum of $125,000,000 which cannot be used by its owners profitably, and we can readily see that there is more available ready money on hand than the necessities of domestic and foreign commerce require.

Now, money is much like other commodities. If it is in excess, it depreciates; if it is in deficiency, it appreciates. That it is in excess is shown by the figures I have just given, and also that its depreciation does not arise from any doubt of the ability of the Government to eventually liquidate its whole indebtedness.

There is, however, a greater obstacle than a depreciated currency to be removed before the Government can resume specie payments and maintain such a resumption. That obstacle is to be found in the fact that we are a debtor nation, and that our resources are annually drawn from us to pay our annual interest and the annual balances arising from our foreign traffic.

It is generally acknowledged that our indebtedness to foreign nations is over $2,000,000,000. The great leader of the democratic party party in 1872, its standard-bearer and candidate for the Presidency, estimated that our annual interest due to foreigners was one hundred and twenty-five millions. A part of our bonded debt has been reduced from 5 per cents to 6 per cents, and a part has been paid since then. Governor Tilden, in his late message, estimates the annual interest still due abroad at one hundred millions. How that heavy indebtedness was incurred and the annual burden imposed upon us is easily explained to us in the Treasury reports, which show an extraordinary expenditure engendered by a superabundant currency, profitable war expenditure engendered by a superabundant currency, profitable war contracts, extravagant habits, and all the concomitants attendant upon a vicious circulating medium, the result of the late war.

Beginning with the war of the rebellion in 1861 and concluding with the fiscal year ending in 1875, we find that we imported of foreign merchandise $6,207,800,000, and of foreign specie $286,500,000, amounting in all to $6,494,300,000. To settle this indebedness we exported of our own domestic merchandise only $4,817,700,000, and of foreign merchandise, $231,400,000. These sums did not balance accounts between us and foreign nations, and we added to them of our own species $192,100,000, and of foreign species $192,100,000, and of foreign species $292,100,000, and of foreign species $292,100,000, and of species $292,100,000, own specie $959,100,000, and of foreign specie $122,100,000; amounting in all to $6,130,300,000, leaving us still short $364,000,000 on the custom-house books.

As the amount of gold in the country in 1860 was estimated at $275,000,000, in 1861 at $250,000,000, and is now estimated by the Director of the Mint at only $140,000,000, it is evident that in settling with foreign nations we paid them every dollar of the gold we raised from the mines, and drew on our reserved fund for $135,000,000 more. This was only the balance of trade as snown by the custom house and not the balance of accounts as shown on the great national ledger and not the balance of accounts as shown on the great national ledger. To This was only the balance of trade as shown by the custom-house books, when we made our annual settlement with the outside world. To this again must be added at least 5 per cent. for undervaluations on the imports, making at least twenty-five to thirty million dollars per an-num. In addition we may safely add $5,000,000 for smuggled goods,

Before the war we carried three-fourths of our products to foreign countries in our own vessels and realized the freights thereon, which amounted to many millions; but now we have but one-third of the carrying trade of our own products, and hence have to pay to foreigners for carrying the remaining two-thirds of our commodities, which is another heavy item of our annual indebtedness, the amount of which am unable to estimate. It is many millions.

To all these must be added the annual payment of $100,000,000 or more of interest on national, railroad, State, and municipal bonds, which does not appear on the custom-house books, and with these matters operating against us more or less during the period mentioned, we can readily understand how the immense indebtedness abroad has originated, and appreciate the fact that we are a greatly indebted nation.

If we should examine the Treasury reports alone, which show a custom-house balance in our favor for the last two years, we might custom-house balance in our favor for the last two years, we might sonclude we are a creditor nation, but when we take into the calculation those circumstances above mentioned, which never show on the custom-house ledgers, we cannot but conclude that we have still to provide for an annual deficit of perhaps $100,000,000.

With such an annual balance against us, drawing from us every dollar of gold that we raise from the earth and also encroaching on our surplus with silver rapidly depreciating in the markets of the world because of the disuse of it as a legal-tender in Germany, Denmark, and Sweden and Norway, we cannot hope to maintain a redemption of the greenbacks and a general resumption of specie payments. As the law now stands, it is a financial impossibility. We can only hope to bring about a resumption by making ourselves a creditor na-

The ease with which a creditor nation can manage great financial burdens was most notably exhibited recently in the case of France. When Prussia placed her foot on the neck of France and imposed upon her a fine of five billions of francs in gold and silver or their equivalent, amounting to $1,000,000,000, to pay her expenses in the war, and gave her only three years to pay it, the world stood aghast at the magnitude of the penalty and the short time in which it was to be liquidated. But France was equal to the emergency. She was a creditor nation. Almost all the world owed her tribute, and her peocreditor nation. Almost all the world owed her tribute, and her people had hordes of specie besides. She drew her bills on her debtors. England, Holland, Belgium, even Prussia, owed her, and by her drafts on these nations she liquidated nine-tenths of her indebtedness before the stipulated time, and settled the balance with about fifty millions of dollars in gold and as much in silver, and in all the war the notes of the Bank of France did not fall more than 3 per cent below par.

Our case has been exactly the opposite. We have been and are still a debtor nation; and the legal-tender notes of the Government and the national-bank notes fell as low as forty cents in the dollar.

and the national-bank notes fell as low as forty cents in the dollar. If, then, we hope to effect specie payments within the time designated, we must remove the obstacles of which I have spoken. I have no doubt we can do it if we make the proper preparation.

As our currency is redundant, the first thing to do is to get rid of the redundancy. That will be most easily effected by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to fund all the greenbacks that may be presented to him in a 4 per cent. bond, payable in thirty or forty years, with interest payable quarterly in gold. As the bond will be at a lower rate of interest than that which prevails in ordinary business transactions, it will only draw off the surplus moneys that are ness transactions, it will only draw off the surplus moneys that are not needed for business operations and which are lying idle and

The greenbacks should be funded whenever presented, and not by monthly installments; and if when business revives the volume of currency should be found too restricted, the remedy is at hand and easily to be applied by the aid of the national banks, which now can be created to an unlimited number and whose issues can only be confined to the limits of the United States loans they can command as a basis of circulation. They will afford a remedy for any stringency in the currency that might be effected by the withdrawal and fundin the currency that might be effected by the withdrawal and funding of the legal-tenders; and this withdrawal should not stop when the limit of $300,000,000 is reached, but should be continued as long as their holders desire to fund them. This would be but a renewal of the privilege granted by the act of 1862, and which was unfortunately repealed by the act of 1863. The operation of such a system will render the greenbacks more valuable as they are retired, and will being them percently spring of gold; and as it was with the books of bring them nearer the price of gold; and, as it was with the books of the Cumean sibyl, it will also be with the legal-tenders—the destruction of some will enhance the value of the remainder.

While this policy will bring the value of the legal-tenders more nearly to that of gold, and will discourage imports and encourage exports to a certain extent, is will make resumption more easy, because of the less amount to be redeemed, and of a reduction of the balance of trade against us, but it will not entirely provide for a full redemption by the Treasury, and a permanent resumption by the banks as well. To effect such resumption we must accumulate a store of gold. We must have under the control of the Government and of gold. We must have under the control of the Government and the banks at least $250,000,000 in gold.

The act of 1875 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may sell bonds to obtain gold. But where can he sell them and get it? Not in England, because she has none to spare. When we obtained the award of $15,000,000 in the Alabama case, England insisted that we should not draw it in gold but in bonds, for it would otherwise disturb her money market. Not from Germany, Sweden, Denmark, or Norway, for they have recently adopted gold as their standard for their legal-tender coinage, and are accumulating it for the wants of their own people. Not from Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, Netherlands, Portugal, or Spain, for their currency is of the double standard and Portugal, or Spain, for their currency is of the double standard and largely in silver. Not in France, for she has not resumed specie payments, and the Bank of France has $300,000,000 in gold and is hoarding more preparatory to her resumption.

If the Secretary of the Treasury should throw upon the European market bonds of sufficient amount to obtain one-quarter of the sum in gold necessary to effect specie resumption it would agitate every money market and exchange in Europe and disturb the whole mone-tary affairs of that part of the globe. It would at once raise the rate of interest in the Bank of England and other financial institutions so high as to make it more profitable to have the gold at home than to let it come to America, and in less than a month after it had reached our shores it would be on its return to the European money centers. To attempt to supply our country with gold by such an artificial process with a hope to retain it to perpetuate a resumption of specie payments would be as idle as to expect to retain water in a sieve.

The question then arises, How shall we accumulate enough specie to effect and maintain redemption and resumption? It cannot be done by any artificial process? It must come by the operations of trade and commerce. It must be effected by making ourselves a creditor and commerce. It must be enected by making ourserves a creator nation, like France, instead of being a debtor nation, as we are and have been for fifteen years. We must buy less and sell more. We imported during the last fiscal year over $550,000,000 worth of the products of foreign industry, as Dr. Young's valuable tables show. Of this immense sum $380,000,000 were dutiable and consumed, more than one-half of which could be manufactured here if sufficient legislative appropriate part of the products of the superconduction of the products of the products of the product of the products of the product lative encouragement were given. For instance, we imported of-

Breadstuffs	$9,000,000
Buttons	2,000,060
Cotton manufactures	24,000,000
Earthenware	4,000,000
Glass	5, 000, 000
Iron and steel
Leather, nearly	10, 000, 000
Lead, nearly	2,000,000
Provisions
Flaxseed, nearly	6,000,000
Tobacco and cigars.
Lumber, nearly	6, 000, 000
Wool and woolen manufactures
Total	151,000,000

If we were to add other small items it would raise the whole amount to one hundred and sixty millions of dollars' worth of articles that we ought to produce or manufacture at home.

Why should we not manufacture at least one-half that amount, say eighty millions, and keep that amount of money in the country, in-stead of sending abroad our gold to pay for such productions? We have the raw material in abundance, ready for use, on every side. We have machinery of the most ingenious kind in our manufactories of woolen, cotton, iron, wood, and other materials. We have mechanics and artisans well skilled in all branches of industry, thousands of whom are idle, yet anxious and willing to work, but whose labor is displaced by the cheaper labor of other nations.

Then, why should we not have such legislation as will give to our working-men the manufacture of a portion at least of those articles already mentioned, so as to prevent a part of the annual drain of gold for the benefit of other nations and retain it within ourselves as an increasing fund for banks and treasury toward the necessities of the day of resumption?

National dignity, national pride, national honor repeatedly pledged, all require that we should use all proper means for accumulating a fund wherewith to liquidate our dishonored indebtedness.

By such legislation we would give employment to the thousands of unemployed artisans and workmen now standing idle around our of themployed artisans and workhen now standing the around our ship-yards, our mills, and manufactories, and would give food and clothing to their half-fed and half-clad families. The retention of $80,000,000, or even less, in our country of what we pay for foreign manufactures would set the wheels of industry in pay for foreign manufactures would set the wheels of industry in motion in every direction, and would give employment and compensation to those to whom we are bound by every tie that binds citizens to a common country and the government thereof to the citizens.

It may be said, however, that our refusal to take that amount of foreign productions would lessen the revenue to a considerable extent.

It would, of course, lessen the revenues to the amount of duties that would otherwise be collected from such importations, but they could be replaced by curtailing some of the expenses of the Government, and by the enhancement of the value of our currency. Those expenses are annually decreasing as we recede from the war and the heavy burdens it has imposed.

I call the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means to the subject, for it is within their province to propose all legislation affecting imports from foreign nations and of raising the ways and means for the redemption of the national currency. I am well aware that this involves the question of adjusting duties, and that to so lay them as to give the home market to our own citizens will be assailed by some as protection and denounced by others as monopoly, and by still others as robbery, as has been done heretofore.

It will no doubt be urged that any legislation effective of the end I propose will be a tax on the consumer of the articles for the manu-I propose will be a tax on the consumer of the articles for the manufacture of which a preference is given to the American citizen, and will insure a rise in prices, not only of the imported article, but of all similar articles produced here, on the allegation that all duties have to be paid by the consumer of the dutiable article and that they equally affect similar articles produced at home. I do not admit the doctrine. Experience proves it untrue. If such a doctrine were true, how is it that all commodities upon which sufficient duties have been imposed, and which could be manufactured in our country, have fallen in price? How is it that Bessemer steel has fallen to one-half the price it cost before we began under an adequate duty to manufacture it here? The consumers of steel surely cannot complain while they profit so highly from the results of a duty. If it were true, the farmers and planters cannot complain, for their wheat, rye, corn, oats, barley, buckwheat, rice, and tobacco are all protected by various rates of duties; and in 1870 the amount of those articles raised in our country was enhanced in price, according to that theory, to the amount of $262,000,000. amount of $262,000,000.

If the theory that duties always enhance prices is true, the converse of it ought also to be true, that repealing duties will lower prices; yet when Congress took the duties off tea and coffee the prices did not fall, but were kept up for the benefit of the foreign producer, as the Treasury reports have shown. Our fathers did not admit the doctrine, for almost the first act they passed in the First Congress was intended to give the preference in manufactures to our own people.

In its earlier and better days the Tammany Society, of New York, did not believe it, for in 1819 it

Resolved. That we discountenance the importation and use in our families of every species of foreign manufacture or production which can or may be reasonably substituted by the fabrics of productions of the United States.

I do not, however, propose to argue the principles now upon which a tariff should be adjusted. I only want to call the attention of the House to the fact that we annually import between five hundred and fifty and five hundred and sixty million dollars worth of foreign articles, of which a large amount could be as well made at home, and by so doing give employment, bread, and clothing to thousands of deserving men now out of work, who are impoverished and a burden on the community, and to the necessity of retaining as an accumulating fund toward resumption a sufficient sum to enable the Government and the bards over the community of the commu ment and the banks easily to resume specie payments in 1879.

I wish to impress upon it the still more important fact that under existing laws we are annually increasing our foreign indebtedness, already two thousand millions, to the amount of one hundred millions or more, and drifting still further away from the possibility of resumption, and that without additional legislation to prevent that annual drain on our resources the resumption of specie payments will remain a financial impossibility. Such a startling fact should well give us pause.

The withdrawal of the surplus legal-tenders will no doubt take away a heavy burden of irredeemable currency that has been enhancemant. ing prices, making them unstable, delusive, and unsatisfactory, and vitiating the channels of trade and commerce, to the disadvantage of the fair dealer and the enriching of the reckless and dashing speculator.

The redundancy of the currency has made this country the best in the world in which the foreigner could sell, because of the unnatural prices it gave to all commodities. It made it the worst in the world to export from, because of the high prices it gave to the raw materials and labor, making the finished production too dear to enter into competition with the markets of the world. It deluded the workingman, for although it enhanced his wages slowly, yet it advanced prices of all articles he consumed more rapidly and in a greatvanced prices of all articles he consumed more rapidly and in a greater proportion.

When my old colored friend John Brown was mowing my lawn during the war I asked him why it was that he charged me twice as much wages as he had done a few years before. His reply was, "Ah, Mr. Townsend, your two dollars and a half to-day will not fill my market-basket to-morrow morning near as full as your dollar and a quarter did a few years ago." John Brown understood the subject practically. He was a political economist without knowing it. It deluded the farmers, because, as Professor Perry told them at subject practically. He was a political economist without knowing it. It deluded the farmers, because, as Professor Perry told them at Omaha in 1874, "it is true that farmers always have been and always will be the greatest losers from rag money, partly for the reason that I have just given—namely, that what they have to buy is enhanced in price by it, while that they have to sell is not enhanced in price by it—and partly, also, because it takes the farmer almost a year to realize on his crops, and he cannot meanwhile insure himself against the inevitable changes in the currency. The dollar in which he calculates the expresse of his group is almost sure not to be the dollar. culates the expenses of his crops is almost sure not to be the dollar in which he realizes the results of his crops. He cannot calculate; he cannot insure himself; he is helpless."

John Stuart Mill has well said:

John Stuart Mill has well said:

Although no doctrine in political economy rests on more obvious grounds than the mischief of a paper currency not maintained at the same value with a metallic one, either by convertibility or by some principle of limitation equivalent to it, and although, accordingly, this doctrine has, though not till after the discussions of many years, been tolerably effectually drummed into the public mind, yet dissentients are still numerous, and projectors every now and then start up with plans for curring all the economical evils of society by means of an unlimited issue of inconvertible paper. There is, in truth, a great charm in the idea. To be able to pay off the national dobt, defray the expenses of government without taxation, and, in fine, to make the fortunes of the whole community, is a brilliant prospect, when once a man is capable of believing that printing a few characters on paper will do it. The philosopher's stone could not be expected to do more.

There is therefore a west proponderance of rescons in favor of a convertible in

There is, therefore, a great preponderance of reasons in favor of a convertible in preference to even the best-regulated inconvertible currency. The temptation to overisue, in certain financial emergencies, is so strong that nothing is admissible which can tend, in however slight a degree, to weaken the barriers that restrain it.

I earnestly commend this doctrine to the study of the democratic syndicate which is now vigorously wrestling with the currency question, and which has in charge the delicate and difficult task of harmonizing the conflicting opinions of leaders of the party on that question, and which, I hope, will present some feasible scheme of sustaining the nation's pecuniary credit and upholding the nation's repeated pledges of a specie resumption.

In short, such a currency benefits no one but the keen, sharp, shrewd speculator, who is always on the watch to take advantage of every change in the money market and to be a bull or a bear or to make a corner in stocks, gold, currency, or commodities, as the opportunity may offer.

Taking away this redundancy will bring prices to their normal condition, restrain in some degree excessive importations, restore confidence to business men, encourage legitimate business affairs, and raise the balance of the currency nearer to a par in gold, and make raise the balance of the currency nearer to a par in gold, and make more easy the task of resumption.

If we can, in addition, so legislate as to give to our workingmen the opportunity of creating a portion of those commodities we now purchase abroad, we will retain a portion of the gold now paid to foreigners and give it to our own people, and recognize the principle that should always be present to every patriotic mind that the work of America should be done by the workingmen of America.

The products of our mines, which now pass from our hands as rapidly as they are produced, will remain within our borders and the resumption of specie payments by banks and Government within the time prescribed will be an absolute certainty. Without the adop tion of this policy resumption, in my judgment, cannot be effected. To make it the people's and not the brokers' resumption the law should be so amended as to make the legal-tenders redeemable at some point in every city of the Union and whenever presented in sums from one dollar upward. As the law now stands, those having less than $50 who wish their notes redeemed will have to submit to such a shave as the broker may demand before he will give them gold for their legal-tenders.

In this connection, and before I conclude, I desire to allude to the fact that a great many bills have been introduced into Congress this sion, some intending to provide for specie payments and others to postpone it indefinitely.

The favorite idea of democratic resumptionists seems to be that the Treasurer should reserve a portion of the duties and the banks should retain a portion of their interest on the bonds they own, all of which are payable in gold, as an accumulating fund toward resumption.

The lowest amount to be retained annually by the banks, so far as I have observed, is 5 per cent. on the amount of their circulation and 5 per cent. by the Government on its legal-tenders, and that the time for resumption fixed in the act of 1875 should be postponed until banks and Government could by this process resume.

I am unable to conceive of a scheme that would be more likely to defeat the end intended than this, and to disturb commerce in every quarter. This policy would lock up in the first year $35,000,000, almost as much as the Government owns, and in the second year almost as much as the Government owns, and in the second year as much more, being a greater amount than both banks and Government now hold. As this locking-up process went on gold would become more scarce, and would rise in price far beyond the present figures, and the merchant would find difficulty in obtaining it to pay duties; and as the Government would be required to hold the amount locked up, it would experience great trouble in obtaining enough to pay its interest, for which the faith of the nation is pledged.

The result of this policy would be to give to the gold speculator an early opportunity to make a corner in gold and raise its price to an extraordinary figure, to the destruction of all legitimate commerce, the embarrassment of the banks, and the discredit of the nation. All artificial expedients like these to procure a resumption of specie pay-artificial expedients like these to procure a resumption of specie payments will inevitably fail, for the end desired can only be obtained by a close observation of and respect for the fixed principles that govern currency and those that regulate internal and external commerce.

We ought not, therefore, to adopt the policy of locking up gold, and thus create a stringency in the gold market that would inevitaand thus create a stringency in the gold market that would inevitably embarrass commerce in every direction. Neither should we adopt the opposite policy of repealing the resumption law. We must have the courage and determination to sustain that law. The preparation for it has already begun. Some ten or twelve millions of subsidiary coin have been prepared, and it cannot be a great while before there will be sufficient to supply the place of the fractional currency and to give to the people for their minor transactions of every-day life a money that will have inherent value instead of the dirty, greasy, and ragged shin-plasters that have to be renewed every fifteen months. This will he a good beginning.

This will be a good beginning.

If, however, we should repeal the resumption law, the sure result would be that the day of resumption being thus indefinitely postponed, the people would at once start forward again in speculative enterprises that would appear to be legitimate business activity; the banks would foster it by extending their loans and discounts, new projects of all kinds would be instituted, and while a seeming pros-perity would ensue, the inflation of the currency would again exag-gerate prices and make necessary more money for business, until credit was stretched to its utmost limit and until on some fine morning a whisper of distrust of some great banking-house in Wall street that had overtraded in stocks, gold, or securities would be heard around, followed by a run and then a crash that would bring down thousands in a common ruin, followed in all probability by a national repudiation.
